FORWARD

The crisis of homelessness is not merely a failure of public policy or social services. It is the visible expression of a deeper ideological capture that has redefined the terms of debate, reshaped the flow of billions of taxpayer dollars, and subordinated the most vulnerable citizens to the ambitions of activist organizations. To understand homelessness today, one must understand not only tents on sidewalks and needles in public parks, but also the institutional networks and ideological projects that perpetuate the problem under the guise of solving it.

In early 2025, President Donald J. Trump issued a series of executive orders that signaled a decisive shift. His administration rejected the prevailing narrative—that homelessness is solely a problem of housing supply and discrimination—and sought instead to restore order to public spaces, strengthen accountability for public spending, and redirect resources toward treatment, rehabilitation, and the enforcement of basic civic norms that will actually benefit the homeless and the public at large. The backlash was immediate. The National Homelessness Law Center, the Southern Poverty Law Center, and allied groups denounced the reforms as “attacks on human rights” and pledged to fight them in court. This response revealed what had long been hidden: the homelessness debate is not about compassion versus cruelty, but about which ideology will govern America’s civic life and actually help her citizens.

This report traces how a vast array of nonprofit organizations, legal activists, and ideological entrepreneurs have built a sophisticated infrastructure around homelessness. Groups such as the Southern Poverty Law Center, the National Homelessness Law Center, the Western Regional Advocacy Project, and the National Low Income Housing Coalition position themselves as defenders of civil rights, yet their work increasingly detaches from the concrete needs of people living on the streets. Rather than delivering services to the needy, many of these organizations devote their resources to litigation, lobbying, and ideological campaigns that expand their own power while leaving the wretched conditions in homeless encampments unchanged—or worse.

The Grants Pass case provides the most striking example. In that Oregon city where the case arose, local leaders sought to enforce basic ordinances prohibiting public camping. Contrary to activist portrayals, Grants Pass was not simply interested in sweeping encampments off the streets. The city had made shelter facilities available, offering humane alternatives to life on the sidewalks. Its aim was to pair enforcement with services, creating a system of accountability and compassion. Yet advocacy groups intervened, filing lawsuits that tied the city’s hands and forced residents to endure sprawling encampments, open-air drug markets, and the erosion of public order. Billions in taxpayer dollars, funneled through federal, state, and municipal contracts, now underwrite organizations that press for similar outcomes nationwide: the removal of enforcement tools, the normalization of encampments, and the expansion of ideological influence under the hypocritical banner of compassion.

The result is a paradox. At precisely the moment when policymakers should be demanding measurable results—fewer people on the streets, more individuals in treatment, cleaner and safer public spaces—our institutions have been persuaded to measure success in ideological terms. The rhetoric of “housing is a human right” and “abolish homelessness” is seductive, but it functions as a smokescreen. Behind it lies a set of interests dedicated to dismantling enforcement, expanding bureaucracies, and keeping streams of funding flowing into activism rather than into effective service delivery to those in desperate need.

I have spent the better part of my career exposing how ideological movements capture institutions. Whether in universities, corporations, or government bureaucracies, the pattern is the same: activists quietly introduce radical premises, redefine language, and exploit moral sentiment to consolidate power. The homelessness industry follows this template with precision. The language of rights replaces the language of responsibility; the pursuit of ideological victory replaces the pursuit of tangible results. And ordinary citizens—whether they are small business owners swept off sidewalks, families priced out of neighborhoods, or the homeless themselves, trapped in cycles of addiction and dysfunction—bear the cost.

This struggle is not peripheral. It represents the future of civic governance in America. If activists succeed in defining homelessness as a protected political identity, immune from enforcement and subsidized without accountability, then the principle of equal citizenship collapses. Public order becomes impossible. The city itself is transformed into an ideological playground, where activists dictate policy and taxpayers are conscripted into funding their projects.

The alternative is not cruelty, as critics allege, but clarity. Cities can and must enforce basic standards of public order. They must distinguish between those who are temporarily down on their luck and those who are deeply enmeshed in addiction, crime, and dysfunction. They must direct resources toward treatment programs, recovery services, and pathways back into productive citizenship. And they must hold accountable the organizations that receive billions in public money, demanding measurable outcomes rather than ideological pronouncements.

This report, titled Infiltrated, documents the mechanics of ideological capture in the homelessness sector with remarkable precision. It reveals how activists and their institutional allies have embedded themselves within the very systems meant to serve the homeless, redirecting resources toward ideological projects rather than practical solutions. It uncovers how networks of activists, lawyers, and nonprofits have leveraged sympathetic rhetoric to mask destructive agendas. It follows the money, showing how taxpayer dollars sustain not only service providers but also political campaigns and litigation strategies. And it provides a clear view of the stakes: if we fail to reassert civic responsibility and institutional accountability, we will condemn our cities to permanent disorder.

For policymakers, the lesson is urgent. Executive orders and legislative reforms must be paired with a deeper understanding of the forces arrayed against reform. Journalists must resist the temptation to reproduce activist talking points and instead investigate the networks of money, power, and ideology that shape homelessness policy. Citizens must demand that their leaders reclaim public space, restore order, and resist the drift toward ideological extremism disguised as compassion.

Homelessness is not an unsolvable problem. It is a problem that requires courage, clarity, and the willingness to challenge entrenched interests. The path forward is not to double down on the failed experiments of the past four decades, but to reclaim the principles of order, accountability, and genuine compassion that can restore both dignity to the homeless and safety to our communities.

This report is an indispensable guide for that task, building on decades of research on how to serve the needs of the homeless better than we now do.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In response to the escalating challenges posed by homelessness across American cities, President Donald Trump issued a series of executive orders in 2025 aimed at addressing both immediate public safety concerns and underlying systemic issues. The first, signed in March, Making the District of Columbia Safe and Beautiful, focused on revitalizing the nation's capital by directing the National Park Service to swiftly clear homeless encampments and graffiti from federal lands in Washington, D.C. This move was driven by a desire to restore aesthetic order and ensure public spaces remained accessible and safe for all citizens, reflecting broader frustrations with urban decay that had allowed such encampments to proliferate in the first place.¹

Building on this momentum, Trump's May executive order, Keeping Promises to Veterans and Establishing a National Center for Warrior Independence, established the National Center for Warrior Independence, a dedicated facility designed to provide comprehensive care, benefits, and support services exclusively for homeless veterans. Motivated by a recognition of the unique sacrifices made by military personnel and the disproportionate impact of homelessness on this group—often exacerbated by untreated PTSD, substance abuse, and bureaucratic hurdles—this initiative sought to honor their service while tackling root causes through targeted rehabilitation and reintegration programs.²

Culminating these efforts, the July 2025 order, titled "Ending Crime and Disorder on America's Streets," took a more sweeping approach by mandating the removal of individuals experiencing homelessness from public thoroughfares, redirecting federal resources toward substance abuse treatment, and expanding civil commitment options for those in need. Enacted amid rising crime rates and public outcry over open-air drug markets and unsanitary conditions in major cities, it prioritized funding for jurisdictions enforcing bans on public camping and drug use, while emphasizing mental health interventions to foster long-term stability and enhance community safety.³

While President Trump's executive orders are designed to ensure public safety and address the root causes of homelessness to achieve long-term remediation, a confluence of advocates, policies, activists, and initiatives are working in direct opposition to these goals.

Nonprofits, often key service providers, have increasingly shifted toward political advocacy and legal activism, contributing to what is referred to as the Homeless Industrial Complex. Policy debates largely center on Housing First and Harm Reduction models, which emphasize immediate housing and risk reduction without fully addressing the primary causes of homelessness, including addiction and mental illness. Some providers support these approaches because they feel they are the most compassionate way to help the homeless, but others advocate Housing First and Harm Reduction policies to promote broader ideological goals under the banner of Housing Justice, framing homelessness as a symptom of capitalism's systemic oppression and resisting enforcement-focused policies like those introduced by President Trump.

This report seeks to uncover the vast network working to exploit America's homelessness crisis to further radical, intersectional agendas. Using financial data, legal records, and research, this report details how parts of the nonprofit sector have become vehicles for advancing ideological frameworks and legal activism, often with public funding. It examines this through three lenses: funding networks, legal positioning, and ideology.

Key Findings

1. Abundant Resources Flow to Help the Homeless: Well-funded networks, supported by government grants and private philanthropy, have enabled some activists to leverage the homelessness crisis as a platform for advancing extremist ideologies.

2. The shift from Charitable Work to Advocacy Work: Some nonprofits are increasingly engaged in coordinated advocacy campaigns that go beyond direct service to the needy. In the 2024 Supreme Court case City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, the Court ruled that ordinances banning homeless individuals from camping or sleeping on public property do not constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The decision allowed cities to enforce restrictions with fines and other penalties. A wide range of housing-related nonprofits—many publicly funded—filed legal briefs opposing public camping restrictions. This illustrates a growing convergence between service delivery and formal advocacy work among homelessness nonprofits.

- In 2023 alone, 990 tax filings reveal that a majority of the over 700 nonprofits that filed amicus briefs in the Grants Pass case received a combined $2.9 billion in government grants—representing approximately one-third of their total reported revenues. Many of these groups also receive private funding from ideologically aligned foundations and donor-advised fund networks.^{4,5}

3. Legal Protections and Tax Advantages Obscure True Intent: While 501(c)(3) charities

are prohibited from partisan political activity and limited in the amount of formal lobbying they can do, these same protections and tax benefits can be—and in some cases are—leveraged by extremist elements operating within the homelessness policy sphere. By structuring themselves as charities, such groups gain access to tax-deductible donations and, in many cases, public funding, all while pursuing advocacy campaigns, litigation, or pressure tactics that reflect controversial or ideological agendas. Donors and taxpayers often believe they are supporting humanitarian relief, yet their contributions may instead underwrite political activity that departs sharply from those expectations. This exploitation of charitable status blurs the line between service provision and ideological activism, obscures true intent, and undermines accountability for how both public and private resources are deployed.

4. Housing Justice as an Ideological Gateway: The Housing Justice framework has evolved beyond affordability campaigns into a radical movement linking homelessness to systemic racism, capitalism, and policing. Groups such as Causa Justa :: Just Cause (Bay Area) and City Life/Vida Urbana (Boston) originated as grassroots tenant advocates but now operate alongside many broader Housing Justice networks that resist enforcement, pursue litigation challenging state practices, and align at times with radical protest movements.

5. Intersectionality: Extremist networks involved in pro-Hamas activism are also active in homelessness advocacy coalitions. A 2024 report by the Capital Research Center, Marching Toward Violence, documented more than 150 U.S.-

based organizations that supported or defended Hamas after the October 7 terrorist attacks. While the report focused on campus protests, it also identified a deep ideological network of extremists that extends well beyond university campuses. Several of the same radical groups in that report are also key participants in Housing Justice coalitions and homelessness policy advocacy. The housing first/harm reduction approach to homelessness enables this infiltration by framing law enforcement as oppression and advancing the notion that policing and criminalization practices target and harm the homeless. And so we see a growing alignment between radical protest movements and some segments of the homelessness nonprofit sector—aka the Homeless Industrial Complex. In several cases, the same groups, leaders, and/or fiscal sponsors are involved in both spaces—raising questions about how American taxpayer-funded service groups may be influenced by, or connected to, groups that promote deeply polarizing and sometimes radical agendas.⁶

6. Exploitation by Extremist Groups: The cumulative effect is the exploitation of homelessness policy by extremist ideological movements. A growing fringe of U.S.-based activist organizations—some openly sympathetic to Marxist, anti-capitalist, or anti-American ideologies—is increasingly leveraging the homelessness crisis as a platform to advance broader political objectives. These groups often frame their work in the language of humanitarianism, but their activities reflect a deeper agenda rooted in systemic opposition to American institutions and liberal democratic norms. The inherent vulnerabilities of the homelessness response system—namely, heavy public funding, weak oversight, and blurred lines between service and advocacy—have created fertile ground for this ideological capture. As a result, what appears to be a humanitarian policy infrastructure is, in some cases, functioning as a conduit for political radicalization under the guise of social justice. While many frontline groups act from genuine compassion, extremists exploit these policies to advance radical agendas.

This Capital Research Center report demonstrates how a growing number of organizations in the homelessness policy space are aligned with radical—even extremist—worldviews, ranging from anti-police and anti-capitalist movements to groups that express support for foreign terrorist organizations. These actors have exploited structural vulnerabilities in the nonprofit sector—lax oversight, complex funding channels, and even the legal system—to push ideas that are not merely unorthodox but deeply destabilizing.

INTRODUCTION

Across the country, Americans are witnessing cities unravel under the weight of a homelessness crisis that shows no signs of abating. Tent encampments line sidewalks. Public parks have been overtaken, and the fentanyl crisis has worsened every dimension of street-level homelessness. Enforcement efforts are delayed, defunded, or blocked outright. Citizens are afraid.

To many, the assumption is simple: this is a policy failure—one caused by a lack of resources, housing, or compassion.

But this report tells a different story.

Far from being under-resourced, the homelessness response system commands extraordinary levels of funding. Billions of taxpayer dollars and philanthropic grants flow annually into a vast network of nonprofit organizations. Much of this money is funneled into programs shaped by the Housing First and Harm Reduction models. Housing First prioritizes rapid, unconditional housing placements, while Harm Reduction emphasizes minimizing the harm of drug use rather than requiring abstinence or treatment before receiving services. These models are promoted as solutions, but the evidence is mixed at best. Housing First can produce temporary housing stability, yet it consistently fails to resolve underlying addiction or mental illness. Harm Reduction may lower immediate risks, but it often normalizes continued drug use and leaves people trapped in cycles of dependency. Far from “solving” homelessness, these approaches have left entire cities struggling with entrenched street-level disorder.

Layered on top of these approaches is the emergent Housing Justice movement. Unlike Housing First or Harm Reduction, which present themselves as policy frameworks, Housing Justice is explicitly ideological. It recasts homelessness not simply as a crisis of housing supply or public health, but as proof of systemic racism, capitalism, and policing. Housing Justice groups resist enforcement, mobilize protests, and litigate against ordinances they view as criminalizing poverty. The stakes of this advocacy came into sharp relief in City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, decided by the Supreme Court in 2024. The case tested whether cities could enforce camping bans against people with nowhere else to go without violating the Eighth Amendment’s ban on cruel and unusual punishment. While the case began as a local dispute in Oregon, it quickly grew into a national referendum on how American society chooses to respond to homelessness. What made Grants Pass remarkable for our purposes was the sheer scale of nonprofit mobilization: hundreds of groups—many organized as 501(c)(3) charities—filed amicus briefs, making it one of the most heavily lobbied homelessness cases in U.S. history. Collectively, these amici reported more than $9.1 billion in revenue, underscoring that this debate is not only about ideology but also about the immense resources flowing through the sector.

This phenomenon underscores a broader transformation in the nonprofit sector. Organizations once devoted to direct aid—shelter, food, treatment, pathways to stability—have increasingly repositioned themselves as advocacy machines. Operating with the tax advantages and public trust of charitable institutions, many now function less like charities and more like political actors: filing lawsuits, lobbying through pressure campaigns, and shaping public narratives with taxpayer-backed funding.

The protest dimension of this advocacy model has also proven highly vulnerable to capture. Extremist groups—some with histories of anti-capitalist, anti-police, or even pro-Hamas agitation—have embedded themselves within Housing Justice coalitions and related advocacy networks. They leverage the homelessness crisis to advance broader agendas that have little to do with getting people off the streets. These actors exploit the credibility of service-oriented nonprofits and the vast resources of the homelessness response system to cloak radical activism in the language of charity.

Our research shows that this overlap is not hypothetical. We identified scores of organizations that illustrate the convergence of radicalized housing justice groups that filed amicus briefs in Grants Pass. Some of these nonprofits are heavily funded by taxpayers—several report that more than 80 percent of their revenue comes from government grants—yet their activities extend far beyond direct service into litigation, protest, and ideological campaigns. Bill Wilson Center (Santa Clara County, CA) is one such example. Their audit shows that approximately 89 percent of its funding is from the government. Far from providing exclusive direct services, BWC maintains an explicit “Advocate / Take Action” hub that lists its top policy priorities and provides resources for contacting elected officials.⁷

The Grants Pass case crystallizes the central finding of this report: what looks like charity to the public often operates as advocacy—and sometimes as a conduit for extremist agendas—underwritten by taxpayer funds.

The chapters that follow tell a story of hundreds of charities—many heavily subsidized by both tax-deductible contributions and taxpayer dollars—that have been mobilized not to provide shelter or treatment, but to advance policy and ideological priorities ranging from radical to extremist.

Capital Research Center researchers spent many hours tracking how funding streams, legal strategies, and advocacy networks embed these dynamics into the homelessness response system. This report reveals how well-meaning resources meant for aid are increasingly diverted into litigation, protest, and ideological activism—leaving both the homeless and their communities without the solutions they urgently need.

ABUNDANT RESOURCES

MISPLACED PRIORITIES

Contrary to popular belief, America's homelessness crisis persists not because of underfunding but due to how resources are deployed. Each year, billions in taxpayer dollars and philanthropic grants support a sprawling nonprofit ecosystem—many operating under the banner of Housing Justice.

Rather than delivering shelter or treatment, these organizations increasingly shape laws, media narratives, and public policy, often opposing enforcement and advocating ideological positions that stretch beyond operational consensus and challenge recent Supreme Court rulings.

This shift reflects a nationwide evolution in the nonprofit sector. Many institutions once grounded in direct service delivery now act as political power centers, using their tax-exempt status and public credibility to fuel litigation, block legislation, and advance ideological campaigns with minimal scrutiny.

Some examples of that demonstrate the progression among divergent organizational types are as follows. In Washington, DC, North Capitol Collaborative, Inc. (NCCI) began its work in 1997 as a hyper-local direct services provider—staffed at a family success center in the historic DC area of Deanwood, offering rapid re-housing supports, food and diaper distribution, employment training, and case management to stabilize vulnerable families.^{8,9,10} Over time, it forged and then broadened its institutional partnerships (including with police, civic associations, and the Community Partnership for the Prevention of Homelessness) quietly building its organizational capacity and advocacy footing.¹¹ That evolution was made explicit in 2024 when NCCI signed onto the Grants Pass amicus brief arguing against the criminalization of homelessness when people lack shelter—shifting from community-level services into legal-trail advocacy on national jurisprudence.¹²

In Los Angeles, LA CAN followed a parallel path of increasing emphasis on advocacy over services. Formed in 1999 by just 25 Skid Row residents, it initially centered on community organizing and basic services—civil rights protection, resistance to criminalization, housing access, healthy food, and economic development. Over the years, LA CAN broadened into grassroots policy engagement: launching tenant organizing campaigns that preserved low-income housing, filing litigation against discriminatory or punitive city policies (e.g., the Safer Cities Initiative), advancing public policy reforms (e.g., legal access to farmers' markets via SNAP/EBT), and issuing foundational works like a “Human Right to Housing” platform.^{13,14,15} Interestingly, LA CAN is also a member of the Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP) coalition whose communications consistently frame policing as a structural enemy of housing justice and which organizes national campaigns against “criminalization of poverty.”¹⁶

A similar dynamic can be seen in organizations whose mission is not limited to housing. For instance, the Council on American Islamic Relations' Chicago branch (CAIR-Chicago) publicly aligned with Black Lives Matter, championing policy changes around police accountability and budget priorities.^{17,18} By embedding itself in BLM's advocacy network, CAIR intersects with housing justice coalitions—most prominently the Right to the City Alliance (RTTC) which explicitly endorsed BLM's call to redirect public resources from policing to housing and community development.¹⁹

The third section of this report provides more information on RTTC and the connection between it and BLM and CAIR, but to lay the groundwork let's look at one example of this intersection which appears with California Renters Power Assembly.²⁰ This assembly advocates for racial equity in housing by centering tenant power, organizing for housing justice, and explicitly grounding its work in principles of racial, economic, and gender justice.²¹ They are a member of RTTC. The California Renters Power Assembly and its lead organizations, including Tenants Together, have publicly affirmed support for the Black Lives Matter movement and have explicitly tied their housing justice work to the broader struggle for Black lives and racial justice. They claim to address systemic barriers by pushing for policies like expanding rent control, increasing tenant legal protections, and fighting displacement, which are fundamental to racial justice in housing.^{22,23}

In July 2025, RTTC partnered with Popular Democracy in Action (PDA) and PolicyLink (PL) to write the report Our Homes, Our Future. PDA is a collection of over 50 organizations operating in the community organizing and racial advocacy space. PolicyLink is a 501(c)(3) organization describing itself as a national research and action institute advancing economic and social equity that focuses on climate change, economic justice, and housing issues.^{24,25,26} CAIR lists PolicyLink as a partner organization in the 2021 annual report on its website.²⁷ It's a well-documented relationship that includes a joint lawsuit PolicyLink highlighted on an archived version of its website that included partner organizations AA-JC-Asian Law Caucus, Council on American-Islamic Relations, and ACLU of Northern California, suing to limit the FBI's Joint Terrorism Taskforce surveillance and intelligence gathering activities within local communities.²⁸ CAIR is also listed as one of PolicyLink's funded partners within their Center for Equitable and Mixed Income Program (CEMI).²⁹ PL frequently invites CAIR representatives to partner in their community programming. This is one example of the intersection of an RTTC housing organization, BLM and CAIR.³⁰

Intersections like these were critical in Seattle during the 2020 Capitol Hill Organized Protest (CHOP), where demonstrators embraced the broader "divest/invest" agenda—pressing the city to reallocate funds from law enforcement toward homelessness services and community resources.^{31,32,33} Throughout the CHOP occupation, many unsheltered individuals lived within the protest zone, serving as volunteers, organizing food distribution and basic medical aid, turning the area into a de facto encampment and visibly linking the protest to homelessness issues.^{34,35} ABC News reported that inside the zone, people can walk freely among murals, access free food, and gather to organize..."—highlighting the informal co-op provision of food and the atmosphere of communal living.³⁶ Data analysis confirmed the concern over CHOP protests: crime within the CHOP area rose nearly 133 percent, compared to adjacent zones, challenging the notion that the protest's approach was compatible with public safety. This data raises a pivotal question for policymakers: when charitable funding morphs into political traction, are public resources still serving vulnerable individuals experiencing homelessness—or advancing a broader agenda?³⁷

Escalating Homelessness Response

Homelessness in the United States has surged to unprecedented levels, after a brief period of reprieve during the COVID-19 pandemic when extraordinary policy responses—expanded public and private funding, eviction moratoriums, and emergency relief programs—temporarily shielded many vulnerable individuals from losing housing. With those measures now expired, the systemic drivers of homelessness—ranging from strained mental health services, misaligned drug policies, unaffordable housing and stagnant wages—have re-emerged with greater force, fueling today's sharp escalation.³⁸

United States Department of Housing and Urban Development and then (HUD)'s data illustrate the scope of the crisis. The Point-in-Time Count shows that on a single night in 2024, about 705,700 people were experiencing street-level homelessness—either in emergency shelters (431,478) or unsheltered on the street (274,224). The Housing Inventory Count adds another 82,485 in transitional housing and 680,855 in long-term subsidized housing such as permanent supportive housing, rapid rehousing, or other permanent housing. In total, HUD reports about 1.47 million people across the five major homelessness cohorts (street-level, transitional housing, permanent supportive housing, rapid rehousing, and other permanent housing). Most of these placements represent federally subsidized programs, though HUD’s reporting does not always emphasize the scale of that public investment. While permanent supportive housing and rapid rehousing remain core elements of the system, many of the temporary subsidies introduced during the pandemic that briefly expanded capacity have since expired. The figures therefore combine “heads,” or people directly counted, with “beds,” or program placements, offering a picture of both the population experiencing homelessness and the resources directed to them. (See chart on previous page)

Because HUD’s lens centers on visible homelessness and formal program placements, it does not capture the full extent of instability among children and youth. The Department of Education (DOE), through the McKinney-Vento program, uses a different definition that includes students who are “doubled up” with relatives or friends due to loss of housing or economic hardship, as well as those living in hotels and motels, shelters, or unsheltered conditions. According to the 2024 National Center for Homeless Education report, schools identified more than 1.37 million pre-K–12 students as experiencing homelessness during the 2022–2023 school year under this alternate definition. Together, the HUD cohorts and DOE data reveal both the visible emergency and the hidden instability that define today’s homelessness crisis.³⁹

The regional distribution of homelessness adds another layer of complexity. West Coast states, particularly California and Washington, report the largest unsheltered populations. While housing costs and limited supply are frequently cited, the policies these jurisdictions adopt also shape outcomes. Approaches that allow open drug use or promote safe consumption sites, combined with limited enforcement of existing public order laws, make homelessness more entrenched and visible. By contrast, many states in the South and Midwest report lower per capita rates of unsheltered homelessness, reflecting stronger law enforcement and the absence of such permissive drug policies. These differences highlight how homelessness is influenced not only by economic pressures but also by regional choices about law, enforcement, and public health.⁴⁰

Such uneven geography also helps explain why homelessness becomes a flashpoint for political and social conflict. In regions where visible encampments dominate public space, homelessness is framed as a crisis of order and safety. In areas where it is less visible but widely felt through schools and doubled-up families, it surfaces as a crisis of poverty and neglect. Both contexts can create vulnerabilities that more radical groups seek to exploit—mobilizing frustration against government policy and channeling community anger into protest movements. In this way, the geography of homelessness not only shapes policy responses but also influences the broader social and political narratives that surround the crisis.

The Rise of “Housing Justice”

In current debates over homelessness policy, three approaches dominate discussion: Housing First, Harm Reduction, and Housing Justice. While each presents itself as a humanitarian solution, the latter has increasingly become a vehicle for radical activism. Extremist actors intentionally deploy terms like “Housing Justice”—and at times even “Housing First”—as anodyne expressions that mask broader ideological agendas.^{42,43,44}

Among these, Housing Justice provides the largest opening for extremist infiltration because of its activist, protest-driven culture. Housing First has less overlap but still risks co-optation when framed as a rights-based entitlement rather than a recovery-oriented program.

Housing First

- Housing First emphasizes providing immediate, permanent housing without preconditions such as sobriety or treatment compliance. Its rationale is that stable housing provides a foundation to address deeper issues like addiction or mental illness. The effectiveness of this approach, however, is questionable. Federal promises to “end homelessness” through Housing First, unsheltered homelessness rose 12 percent between 2022 and 2023, with projections worsening without reform. California epitomizes the failings of this approach. After the state mandated all funding flow exclusively to Housing First programs (2015–2019), unsheltered homelessness increased 47.1percent.⁴⁵

By removing service participation requirements, Housing First often devolves into “housing-only,” reducing access to treatment and recovery opportunities. Misaligned metrics are also at play, as success is often measured by voucher distribution rather than outcomes like sobriety, self-sufficiency, or long-term recovery. Robert Marbut, Senior Fellow at the Discovery Institute’s Center on Wealth & Poverty, has consistently called Housing First a failure, advocating for integrated supportive services instead.⁴⁶

Harm Reduction

- Harm Reduction strategies aim to limit the negative health and social consequences of substance use, such as through needle exchanges or safe-use sites, without requiring abstinence. While Harm Reduction may be rooted in individual autonomy, critics believe it is also dangerously permissive, often consigning addicts to a slow death by normalizing dependency without accountability.⁴⁷ Compassionate rhetoric and well-intentioned approaches fail to restore individuals to health and stability, thus perpetuating the root causes of homelessness. The July 2025 Executive Order explicitly rejected Harm Reduction along with Housing First, reaffirming a shift toward treatment-driven and recovery-oriented solutions.⁴⁸

Housing Justice

- Housing Justice frames housing as a human right, advocating tenant protections, eviction defense, and systemic reforms to ensure what advocates deem equitable access. Grassroots organizations frequently champion affordability and anti-displacement campaigns under this banner, but the movement also serves as a vector for extremist co-optation. Critics argue that Housing Justice, while rooted in calls for equity, often functions as a platform for radical agendas. Caitlyn McKenney, in Tipping the Scales of Housing Justice, published by the 501(c)(3) organization Discovery Institute, warned that sweeping tenant protections can overburden landlords, delay evictions, and shift costs from tenants onto property owners.⁴⁹ Opponents labeled Tacoma’s “Measure 1,” a “socialist” policy and argued it would destabilize the local rental market by reducing inventory and increasing expenses for housing. While the language of Housing Justice stresses fairness and rights, in practice it often advances highly ideological agendas under the guise of reform.⁵⁰

While advocacy groups such as Causa Justa :: Just Cause and City Life/Vida Urbana were traditionally focused on grassroots tenant defense, affordability campaigns, and anti-displacement efforts, elements of the Housing Justice movement have been co-opted by more radical actors. These activists leverage rhetoric about “systemic racism,” “root causes,” and anti-capitalism to advance ideological objectives that extend far beyond housing policy.^{51,52}

By cloaking their agendas in the language of compassion and rights, they exploit public concern for the vulnerable while simultaneously promoting anti-enforcement and anti-accountability frameworks. Understanding this tension between legitimate tenant advocacy and ideological exploitation is essential for evaluating the effectiveness—and the risks—of current homelessness strategies. To that end, Housing First served as the bedrock for more radical approaches to emerge.

Complementing this, Harm Reduction strategies aim to minimize the risks associated with substance use through interventions like needle exchanges or supervised consumption sites (SCS). SCSs are designated locations where individuals can use their own drugs under the supervision of trained professionals, including nurses, physicians, social workers, community health specialists, and peer support staff, thereby reducing overdose risks and linking individuals to services.

When Housing First was officially adopted as the Federal Government’s approach to end homelessness in 2013, the Obama Administration and advocates promised that Housing First would end all homelessness in the United States within 10-years. More specifically they promised Housing First would end veteran homelessness by 2015, chronic homelessness by 2016 and family homelessness by 2020. Indeed, early data from trials funded by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration showed promising results for Housing First, demonstrating higher housing retention rates compared to “treatment first” models, which require individuals to achieve sobriety or engage in treatment before receiving housing.⁵³ Despite billions spent on Housing First programs, homelessness in the U.S. increased for six consecutive years as of 2022, with unsheltered homelessness rising 20.5 percent from 2014 to 2019 even as rapid rehousing and permanent supportive housing units rose.⁵⁴

A 2024 report by HUD, indicates significant limitations in these strategies when applied to high-need populations.⁵⁵

California serves as a prominent example, where widespread adoption of Housing First and Harm Reduction has not halted the growth of encampments. This situation underscores the formidable challenges in managing the continuous inflow of individuals experiencing homelessness, worsened by factors such as escalating housing costs and widening income inequality.⁵⁶

These outcomes stand in stark contrast to the July 2025 Executive Order on Ending Crime and Disorder on America’s Streets, which advocates a significant reorientation of federal priorities, moving away from a sole reliance on Housing First and Harm Reduction to a more multifaceted approach.

The new federal directives emphasize treatment and recovery services, institutionalization for at-risk individuals, and a greater emphasis on accountability in grant distribution, all with the overarching goal of fostering self-sufficiency among those experiencing homelessness. This shift reflects an evolving understanding of the complex factors contributing to homelessness and the need for a broader range of interventions to effectively address the crisis.

Taxpayer-Funded Nonprofits and Policy Failures

Government spending on homelessness has become a massive driver of nonprofit activity, with some organizations deriving more than half of their total revenues from taxpayer funds. This financial dependency is illustrated clearly via City of Grants Pass v. Johnson (2024), a Supreme Court case that tested the limits of local authority to address public vagrancy and encampments. At issue was a municipal ordinance in Grants Pass, Oregon, prohibiting camping on public property.

Plaintiffs argued that such enforcement criminalized the status of being homeless and thus violated the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. The Court disagreed, ruling 6–3 that such ordinances do not inherently constitute unconstitutional punishment. In doing so, the Court reaffirmed the right of local governments to regulate vagrancy and encampments in the interest of public safety and order—while acknowledging the parallel need for humanitarian considerations.

What made this case especially notable, however, was not only the ruling but the scale of advocacy opposition. Hundreds of nonprofit organizations, many heavily funded by government grants, filed amicus briefs urging the Court to strike down the ordinance. These amici did not simply defend the homeless from alleged overreach; this action was a direct opposition to enforcement measures themselves, including encampment clearances, ordinances against public camping, and similar accountability mechanisms. Their position reflected the deep ideological alignment of much of the homelessness advocacy community with Housing First, Harm Reduction, and increasingly, Housing Justice frameworks—approaches that resist enforcement and prioritize unconditional housing and services.⁵⁷

The financial backdrop adds another layer of concern. The Capital Research Center's investigation analyzed the 2023 990 filings of many of these nonprofits, revealing they had collectively received $2.9 billion in government grants, representing 32 percent of their total revenues ($9.1 billion).⁵⁸

Of the organizations comprising the $2.9 billion in government grants, many also receive federal funding through the HUD Continuum of Care (CoC) program. The CoC is designed primarily to support direct housing and homelessness interventions — such as rapid rehousing, permanent supportive housing, emergency shelters, and coordinated entry — along with limited planning and data-management functions. Its purpose is service delivery, not litigation or policy advocacy.

Yet a number of the groups active in advocacy and legal challenges are also substantial recipients of CoC funds. In a sampling of 28 CoC-funded amici organizations, 23 were awarded more than $1 million each in HUD CoC dollars in a single year, with awards in some cases reaching tens of millions. These are taxpayer-funded allocations specifically designated for direct service programs.

- Services for the UnderServed (SUS) — listed in HUD's NY-600 (New York City) FY2023 CoC awards for addiction services and support in the amount of $3,063,587.00⁵⁹
- Father Bill's & MainSpring (FBMS) — included in HUD's FY2023 Massachusetts CoC awards (MA-511) for Father Bill's Project ($3,591,164), among several other funded projects⁶⁰
- Chief Seattle Club — Originating as a direct-service provider for Native people experiencing homelessness, the group now operates multiple permanent supportive housing facilities, street medicine teams, and cultural support programs — supported by more than $16 million in government grants in 2023 alone. At the same time, CSC became a prominent policy advocate, aligning closely with the Biden–Harris Administration's ALL Inside initiative and taking a leading role in shaping Seattle and King County's homelessness response.

The dual role shown by Chief Seattle Club—heavy reliance on taxpayer funding for direct services while simultaneously engaging in high-visibility advocacy—illustrates the blurred line between service provision and political activism in the current homelessness policy landscape.

While it is not possible to assert that the specific dollars granted for direct services were diverted into advocacy or litigation, what is clear is that the financial incentives in the homelessness sector are reshaping organizational missions. Increasingly, nonprofits that once operated almost exclusively as charitable service providers now pursue policy influence, coalition work, and even courtroom strategies. Advocacy brings rewards that direct service alone does not: it raises visibility, attracts foundation money, strengthens political alliances, and can even safeguard service funding by aligning with prevailing policy priorities. It is also far less expensive to mount an advocacy campaign than to finance new shelter beds or supportive housing. For many organizations, the fastest way to grow or sustain influence is not through adding capacity for the homeless, but through adding staff to drive policy.

This dynamic has another consequence: it creates space for bad actors. Once advocacy becomes intertwined with service delivery, groups with other motives—whether ideological, litigious, or purely political — can embed themselves in the “homelessness-industrial complex.” They may continue to qualify for government dollars on the basis of being service providers, while devoting increasing energy to shaping narratives, lobbying policymakers, or pursuing lawsuits that advance agendas only loosely connected to getting people off the streets.

Consider just a few examples:

- Friendship Place (DC) began in 1991 as a neighborhood drop-in center and shelter. Over the years it expanded into housing, employment, and wraparound services. Today, alongside those programs, Friendship Place runs robust advocacy campaigns — delivering testimony at council hearings, orchestrating letter-writing drives, and coordinating with national partners to push for policy reforms.
- Housing Up (DC), originally founded in 1990 as the Transitional Housing Corporation, started with a modest mission: transitional housing for homeless families. As federal funding priorities shifted toward permanent supportive housing and rapid rehousing, Housing Up followed suit — and today its leaders are prominent in affordable housing advocacy and systems-change coalitions.

- Humility of Mary Housing (OH) was established in 1987 to provide eight transitional units for homeless families in Akron. Over three decades, it has evolved into a multi-county service provider with supportive housing programs and a growing advocacy footprint, explicitly incorporating policy change into its mission.

These are only a few examples drawn from the hundreds of amici filers in the Grants Pass case. Are they “chasing the money”? No single blanket statement can capture every organization’s motivations. But the pattern is unmistakable: taxpayer dollars are underwriting nonprofits that no longer see themselves solely as service providers. They are also political actors — shaping debates, lobbying policymakers, and steering the direction of homelessness policy itself.

Further research uncovered an unexpected and disturbing truth: some amici organizations publicly claim they receive “no government funding,” yet records show they are direct recipients of HUD Continuum of Care (CoC) dollars.

- Housing Alliance of Pennsylvania reported $1,885,773 in total revenue on its 2023 IRS Form 990 and disclosed zero in government support. Yet HUD’s records show the organization received a CoC award of $617,716 in both 2022 and 2023 under PA-509 (project PA0736).⁶¹
- Solid Ground Washington likewise reported zero in government funding on its 2023 Form 990. Still, HUD lists it as receiving $158,620 in CoC funds in both 2022 and 2023.⁶²
- Friendship Place (DC)—already noted for its evolution from service provider to policy advocate — also reported zero government grants on its 2023 filing. In reality, HUD’s official FY 2023 CoC press release for DC-500 shows Friendship Place receiving multiple awards for housing projects. Evidence confirms they also received CoC funding in 2022.⁶³

How is this possible? Because these dollars often flow through intermediaries such as local human services agencies, the IRS allows organizations to categorize them as “program service revenue” instead of “government grants.” On paper, the federal source is effectively hidden. Whether these omissions are the product of careless accounting, a permissive reporting framework, or a deliberate effort to obscure the source of funds, the effect is the same. The system is structured in a way that permits—and arguably encourages — this kind of opacity.

Due to the complexities in financial reporting, taxpayers and policymakers cannot easily discern how much federal funding is reaching organizations that, in addition to service delivery, are deeply involved in advocacy, litigation, and policy campaigns. This reporting gap does more than obscure financial accountability—it also makes it difficult to know whether groups are leveraging Americans’ instinct to help the vulnerable as a vehicle to advance other political or ideological goals. In sum, it is virtually impossible to know the true scale of federal homelessness dollars that may be diverted from their intended purpose—or whether they are being deployed in ways that the public would knowingly support if the full picture were visible.

Taken together, the Grants Pass case illustrates a troubling paradox: nonprofits sustained with taxpayer dollars often double as litigants and lobbyists, opposing enforcement measures that many communities see as essential to restoring public order. Operating under the banner of compassion, these groups have become powerful defenders of policy orthodoxies—Housing First, Harm Reduction, Housing Justice—even when those frameworks conflict with accountability or safety concerns.

But taxpayer funding is only part of the picture. To fully understand how these approaches gained such dominance — and why they remain flashpoints in litigation and public debate — we must look to their enablers. Private philanthropy has not only poured billions into the homelessness sector, it has also amplified and entrenched particular ideological frameworks. In doing so, philanthropy often acts less as a neutral supporter of services and more as a force shaping the advocacy ecosystem itself.

Private Philanthropy Fueling the Crisis

Philanthropy has become an influential force in shaping homelessness policy, often reinforcing government priorities but also steering the debate in its own direction. Since 2015, private giving to homelessness and housing has grown sharply. A July 2025 InsidePhilanthropy article reported that between 2015 and 2019, funders contributed about $13.1 billion; from 2020 to 2024, that number jumped to $19.2 billion, including $9.4 billion targeted specifically to programs serving the homeless. This surge reflects both pandemic urgency and a deepening commitment from private foundations, many of which champion Housing First, Harm Reduction, or Housing Justice strategies.⁶⁴

Major Champions of Housing First and Supportive Housing

Several large funders have built their reputations on expanding Housing First–aligned programs. According to its own grants records, The Conrad N. Hilton Foundation has invested more than $100 million in Los Angeles since 2016, backing permanent supportive housing and the LA4LA partnership, after earlier pioneering Housing First models with the Corporation for Supportive Housing.⁶⁵ The Bezos Day One Fund has directed tens of millions nationwide into local and regional efforts such as The Way Home in Houston, credited with housing over 32,000 people at a 90 percent retention rate.⁶⁶

Funders Targeting Perception and Upstream Causes

Other philanthropies focus less on beds and more on shifting narratives and addressing upstream drivers. The Ford Foundation funds tenant rights and anti-discrimination work, including efforts to dismantle the legacy of redlining.⁶⁷ The Kresge Foundation is one of the largest funders of the Fund for Housing and Opportunity collaborative, and through this has awarded over $20 million to renter protection and income inequality initiatives.^{68,69}

Ballmer Group, another participant in that collaborative, invests in cross-sector partnerships to expand affordable housing. The Oak Foundation and the Annie E. Casey Foundation emphasize narrative change and prevention, with Casey concentrating on child and family homelessness. The Harry and Jeanette Weinberg Foundation continues to prioritize stable housing for low-income households.⁷⁰

Advocacy-Oriented Philanthropy and Anti-Enforcement Campaigns

A different set of funders direct resources toward advocacy that resists enforcement measures. The Freedom Together Foundation has spent hundreds of millions since 2020, including $3.4 million to the Southern Poverty Law Center and the National Housing Law Project (NHLP), the latter of which has fought anti-squatter measures and opposed encampment sweeps.⁷¹ The Foundation to Promote Open Society has provided at least $5.6 million to the Center for Constitutional Rights and NHLP, underwriting litigation that challenges anti-camping laws as civil rights violations.⁷² The Tides Foundation has granted over $57 million to the Working Families Organization.⁷³ The Chicago Coalition has demanded UN investigations into U.S. policing, linking homelessness to systemic racism.⁷⁴

The National Low Income Housing Coalition (NLIHC), supported by at least $2.7 million in funding in 2023, of which $2.4 million was from the New Venture Fund (managed by Arabella Advisors), lobbies for expanded federal vouchers as alternatives to enforcement.^{75,76} New Venture Fund's 990 filings from four consecutive years, 2020, 2021, 2022, and 2023 alone show consistent support for groups with radical agendas.^{77,78,79,80} The fund has backed the Poverty & Race Research Action Council, the National Harm Reduction Coalition, and the Alliance for Global Justice, to name but a few.^{81,82,83,84} The Gates Foundation, meanwhile has a long and storied history of funding homelessness-focused initiatives, including those that support Housing First approaches and racial equality.^{85,86}

Donor-Advised Funds and Legal Challenges

Donor-advised funds (DAFs) further complicate the landscape by anonymously funneling millions into advocacy. Since 2020, DAFs like Network for Good have directed funds to the Somerville Homeless Coalition, the Coalition for the Homeless (Washington, D.C.), the Coalition on Homelessness (San Francisco), and the Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP) to name but a few.^{87,88,89,90,91} Many of these same groups filed amicus briefs in City of Grants Pass v. Johnson opposing anti-camping ordinances. Several continue to litigate aggressively: the Coalition on Homelessness in San Francisco has sued over city sweeps, alleging violations of property rights, while the Somerville Homeless Coalition and the D.C. Coalition argue that camping bans criminalize homelessness itself.^{92,93}

Emerging Concerns in Advocacy and Extremism

An examination of funding flows in the homelessness sector shows a consistent pattern: money supports not only direct services but also advocacy efforts that extend deep into policy and legal arenas. This dual role has significant implications. On one hand, it enables innovation and reform; on the other, it often entangles service providers in ideological activism that shapes public policy in ways far removed from shelter beds or treatment programs.

Advocacy in Policy and Legal Arenas

The Supreme Court case City of Grants Pass v. Johnson illustrates this dynamic. In that case, hundreds of nonprofits filed amicus briefs urging the Court to strike down a local ordinance restricting public camping. Their coordinated involvement underscored the scale of advocacy activity within the sector, revealing how philanthropic and taxpayer dollars are frequently deployed not only to address homelessness but also to challenge enforcement mechanisms and vagrancy laws.

This alignment matters. An increasing number of organizations that present themselves as service providers are, in practice, also powerful political actors. Many embrace Housing First, Harm Reduction, or Housing Justice frameworks in ways that lead them to resist enforcement, litigation, and accountability measures. While such advocacy is often framed in humanitarian terms, it carries direct policy consequences—shaping how cities and states are able to respond to encampments, public disorder, and chronic homelessness.

The convergence of philanthropy, government funding, and advocacy underscores a critical point for policymakers: the homelessness crisis is no longer only about housing supply or social services. It has become a contested policy arena where ideology, activism, and litigation often drive outcomes as much as public investment does. Recognizing this dynamic is essential for designing reforms that preserve humanitarian commitments while restoring accountability and public order.

Key Organizations and Their Ideological Stances

Several organizations are driven by distinct ideological frameworks:

- National Housing Law Project (NHLP): This organization receives grants to litigate against restrictions on public camping, directly shaping municipal policies through court challenges. A notable initiative is their push for a National Tenants Bill of Rights, which aims to limit evictions and address landlord harassment. Their framework often posits that enforcement measures exacerbate homelessness.^{94,95}

- Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP): Supported by various foundations, WRAP focuses on “housing justice” campaigns. They frame enforcement as oppression and are deeply embedded in networks with broader social change goals. WRAP has publicly demanded investigations into what they term “militarized” sweeps of encampments, labeling these actions as violations of rights and calling for an end to “banishment policing.”^{96,97}
- Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR): CCR integrates homelessness advocacy with litigation on systemic issues. They occasionally align with entities that express anti-capitalist or anti-enforcement views. For instance, CCR has organized forums on the “criminalization of homelessness,” emphasizing intersectional discrimination and advocating against police involvement in such issues.⁹⁸
- LA Community Action Network (LA CAN): Building on these advocacy patterns, LA CAN exemplifies organizations where activism veers into more extreme positions. They receive funding for community organizing and frequently promote opposition to policing in encampments. LA CAN trains residents to document police actions, framing them as “human rights violations” in housing contexts.⁹⁹
- National Harm Reduction Coalition (NHRC): Backed by philanthropies that emphasize risk minimization, this coalition extends its work to include groups with radical affiliations, some of whom are sympathetic to anarchist or communist ideologies. They advocate for healing from “racialized drug policies” and critique enforcement measures as perpetuating harm.^{100,101}

- Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC): While primarily focused on civil rights, the SPLC also engages in homelessness policy by submitting amicus filings that oppose enforcement. They have connections to networks previously documented in CRC reports regarding pro-Hamas activism crossovers. SPLC has filed briefs against statutes criminalizing solicitation by the homeless, arguing that such laws exacerbate poverty cycles.¹⁰²
- Alliance for Global Justice (AFGJ): As a fiscal sponsor for projects advocating for housing as a human right, AFGJ has ties to internationalist movements that critique U.S. institutions. They conduct workshops discussing foreclosure-homelessness links and advocate for what they term “radical global justice.”¹⁰³
- Sunrise Movement: This environmental advocacy group incorporates affordable housing into its “Green New Deal for Communities.” They align with coalitions that endorse disruptive tactics, such as those seen in the Stop Cop City protests. The Sunrise Movement has supported actions against police infrastructure, tying it to environmental and housing equity.¹⁰⁴
- Tides-sponsored Dream Defenders: This organization has glorified and aligned itself with terrorism and violence perpetrated against Israel. They frame housing rights within abolitionist calls to dismantle capitalism and policing, explicitly identifying as abolitionists seeking to eliminate policing and prisons.^{105,106}
- Housekeys Action Network Denver (HAND): As a member of the Western Regional Advocacy Project, HAND participates in events with groups endorsing resistance movements abroad. HAND has reported on the negative impacts of anti-homeless ordinances, linking policing to increased stress and vulnerability among unhoused populations.¹⁰⁷
- People’s Housing Project in Portland: This group declares the U.S. government illegitimate and demands land decolonization as an integral part of Housing Justice.¹⁰⁸
- Equality for Flatbush (EQ4): Sponsored by the Interreligious Foundation for Community Organization, EQ4 is a Black Lives Matter organization dedicated to fighting “gentrification, displacement, and police violence in Brooklyn.” According to its mission, EQ4 seeks to “end NYPD murders and to stop the displacement of low-to-middle income people from Brooklyn, NY.” The group believes in the abolition of the police, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), and prisons.¹⁰⁹
- October 22nd Alliance to End Homelessness: This alliance aligns with pro-Palestinian activism that defends actions by designated terrorist groups. They organize protests against defense contractors, framing homelessness within broader narratives of resistance.¹¹⁰

The funding picture makes one reality hard to ignore: resources earmarked for homelessness are frequently repurposed to advance broader ideological goals. These goals are not confined to housing policy. They often call for defunding police, dismantling enforcement tools, or recasting housing as a lever for systemic overhaul—sometimes under explicitly anti-capitalist or anti-establishment banners.

What emerges is less a traditional service model than a movement infrastructure. Through grantmaking, litigation, and coordinated campaigns, these networks blur the line between humanitarian aid and political activism. Their influence extends beyond shelter beds and treatment programs, reaching into the heart of civic debates over law, order, and governance itself. In this way, philanthropic flows do more than fill service gaps—they help cultivate an ideological ecosystem that, intentionally or not, challenges democratic norms and the institutions designed to uphold them.

Follow the Money: Nonprofits, Philanthropy, and the Politics of Homelessness

The evidence presented in this section highlights a paradox at the core of America's homelessness response. Rather than being underfunded, the field is flush with billions of dollars from public grants and private philanthropy. However, instead of directing the bulk of these resources toward direct services such as shelter, treatment, or recovery, a significant portion is diverted to advocacy and ideological campaigns. This redirection has altered the role of many nonprofits, evolving them from community service providers into influential political actors who shape public narratives, litigation strategies, and even national policy decisions.

The scale of funding is striking. Philanthropic foundations have poured nearly $20 billion into homelessness and housing initiatives in the past five years, while taxpayer-funded programs like HUD's Continuum of Care channel billions more annually. Together, these flows sustain a vast nonprofit ecosystem whose influence now extends well beyond food banks, rehousing, or transitional care. Advocacy networks, coalitions, and litigants are increasingly prevalent in the space, redefining homelessness not merely as a humanitarian crisis but as a political battlefield over enforcement, policing, and systemic reform.

This evolution raises a crucial question: when financial incentives reward activism as much as, or more than, service delivery, how do we distinguish between organizations genuinely committed to alleviating homelessness and those leveraging the crisis to advance broader ideological agendas? The implications go far beyond organizational mission statements. They reach into the courts, legislatures, and city halls where disputes over public order and accountability are being fought.

For this reason, the next section turns to the City of Grants Pass v. Johnson case, a pivotal moment where the full weight of this advocacy ecosystem became visible. The case illustrates how heavily taxpayer-funded and philanthropically supported organizations mobilized in opposition to local enforcement authority, not only shaping legal precedent but also exposing the degree to which the homelessness-industrial complex has been co-opted by more radical elements. In examining Grants Pass, we can begin to see how an ostensibly humanitarian sector is also a contested arena where billions of dollars and ideological campaigns intersect, with consequences extending far beyond the lives of the unhoused themselves.

Building on this foundation, Part Two will analyze legal activism through Grants Pass, showing how well-funded nonprofits strategically shape enforcement policy, while Part Three maps the ideological networks at the center of this movement—profiling groups with radical and extremist ties and detailing their impact on the national response. Taken together, these analyses reveal how money, ideology, and institutions intersect to shape the homelessness crisis, and why understanding this convergence is essential to designing reforms that reclaim resources for solutions that are both humane and accountable.

THE GRANTS PASS NONPROFIT COMPLEX

When the Supreme Court agreed to hear City of Grants Pass v. Johnson in 2024, the case immediately drew national attention. At its core, the dispute was about whether a small Oregon city could enforce ordinances prohibiting camping on public land without violating the Eighth Amendment’s ban on cruel and unusual punishment. But what began as a local controversy over public order quickly escalated into a defining test of how American society—and its institutions—chooses to respond to homelessness.

Within weeks of the Court’s announcement, advocacy networks mobilized. Hundreds of nonprofits—most organized as 501(c)(3) charities—filed amicus briefs in support of the plaintiffs, opposing local enforcement of encampment bans, and in some cases the overall criminalization of homelessness. The scale of this engagement was striking, but so was its character: organizations the public often imagines handing out meals or running shelters were instead investing in a highly technical legal process before the Supreme Court. That incongruity is precisely why Grants Pass v. Johnson is such a revealing case study. It underscores how the charitable sector as a whole—far beyond any single group—increasingly devotes substantial resources to political advocacy, and how these organizations—and sometimes these very efforts—are often underwritten by taxpayer-funded grants.

This is why we identified Grants Pass v. Johnson as a central case study for our research. The briefs filed in the case expose a broader reality about the nonprofit sector: organizations the public associates with soup kitchens, shelters, and other direct services are increasingly channeling attention—and taxpayer-backed funding—into shaping policy outcomes. That shift raises an uncomfortable question: should 501(c)(3) service providers be devoting scarce resources to advocacy, or should that work be left to groups with other tax statuses better suited for political engagement? However one answers, the trend is clear. A sector long presumed to focus on direct relief is becoming a force in political battles—an evolution that has opened the door for more ideologically driven actors to embed themselves within mainstream coalitions.

Part II of this report examines the Grants Pass amici in detail. It builds on Part 1’s financial mapping to show how philanthropic and government dollars flow through these organizations—together reporting $9.1 billion in total revenue—and how that funding mix blurs the line between aid and advocacy. In doing so, it sets the stage for a deeper discussion of how nonprofits influence—and sometimes distort—the policy landscape around homelessness.

City of Grants Pass v. Johnson

The Supreme Court’s 2024 decision on homelessness in City of Grants Pass v. Johnson serves as a valuable illustration of some counterintuitive realities about the contemporary charitable sector. First, some charities operate with very large budgets, and many are funded not by voluntary donations but by the taxpayer through government grants and contracts. Second, despite their 501(c)(3) status, some charities engage primarily in what could be better called activism, often with a clear political bent. Occasionally, such activism can veer in radical directions.

This situation raises some important questions. Does the nonprofit sector's financial scale—particularly with respect to the government funding it receives—align with the public's conception of what charity is or should be? Is there a way to better distinguish between those groups that serve genuine humanitarian needs and those that try to shape the public policy process and the activism on often-controversial issues? Are taxpayers inadvertently (and involuntarily) subsidizing this activism?

When the Supreme Court agreed to hear City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, the case quickly became a flashpoint in national debates about homelessness, public space, and local authority. But the legal dispute also drew in a wide range of nonprofits—mostly charities—whose participation revealed broader dynamics at work in the nonprofit sector. Before turning to who these groups are, it's worth pausing to consider why homelessness sits at the intersection of public sympathy, charitable response, and policy complexity.

Homelessness is a serious and (in certain places) very visible problem—one with multiple complex causes and contributing factors that have thus far eluded effective solutions. There is broad public support for addressing the profound personal and societal costs of homelessness, and sincere efforts to do so are widely regarded as among the most essential expressions of charitable purpose. That makes homelessness a revealing lens through which to examine key features of the contemporary nonprofit sector, particularly 501(c)(3) public charities. On balance, the sector is a tremendous national asset. At the same time, not all charities fit the typical public image of small, local groups doing on-the-ground work to help those in need.

One way to illustrate this is through the hundreds of nonprofits that filed or signed on to amicus briefs supporting the plaintiffs/respondents in the Supreme Court case of City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, which was decided in 2024.¹¹¹ The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) called Grants Pass “the most significant court case about the rights of people experiencing homelessness in decades,” and it attracted much attention from those with an interest in its outcome, one way or the other.^{112,113}

Grants Pass arose from an ordinance passed by the city of Grants Pass, Oregon, which prohibited camping on public property. Plaintiffs sued on behalf of the city's homeless population, arguing that the ordinance violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court ultimately disagreed, ruling 6-3 that generally applicable regulations against camping on public property did not violate the Constitution. The effect of the decision was to enhance the ability of local governments to deal with homeless encampments, which can cause serious problems for the communities in which they exist.^{114,115}

The Supreme Court agreed to take the case in January 2024. Before the end of the month, a group called the National Homelessness Law Center had set up a website devoted to it, where it ultimately posted 41 amicus briefs filed by over 1,000 different organizations and individuals opposed to “the use of arrest and fines to address homelessness.”¹¹⁶ These briefs, plus one more filed by a group called the National Coalition for Men, were all submitted in support of respondents (plaintiffs in the original lawsuit). On the other side, dozens of briefs were also submitted in support of the petitioner (defendant in the original lawsuit), the city of Grants Pass, Oregon.¹¹⁷

Amicus Curiae (“friend of the court”) briefs are submitted by groups and individuals who are not themselves a party to the case but nevertheless claim an interest in its outcome. Amici present their perspective on issues raised by the case for the justices to consider. Aside from any influence these briefs may have over the decision itself, they can also be helpful for understanding where certain groups stand on controversial legal and/or public policy issues. In Grants Pass, amici submitted or joined briefs because they have an opinion on the nation's homelessness crisis and how to address it.

A comprehensive analysis of the amicus briefs filed in support of respondents/plaintiffs in Grants Pass reveals 759 distinct organizational amici, excluding individuals, government entities, and duplicate groups that joined more than one brief. Most (at least 85 percent) are nonprofits with their own IRS tax-exempt status. The vast majority of these are organized as 501(c)(3) charities.

Over 60 additional groups are housed within an independent 501(c)(3), whether as a program or project, through a fiscal sponsorship, or some other arrangement. The identity and tax status of approximately three dozen amici could not be determined with an acceptable degree of confidence.¹¹⁸

Billions for Charity, Billions from Government

The National Homelessness Law Center described Grants Pass as the “case that made it a crime to sleep outside” and “a clear sign” that the Supreme Court and elected officials would rather side with billionaires and make homelessness worse than simply ensure everyone is safely housed.” Such rhetoric—invoking the ultra-wealthy as political adversaries—is a familiar feature of modern advocacy. But it also invites a closer look at the financial realities of those weighing in on the case.¹¹⁹

Many of the nonprofit organizations that supported the plaintiffs are themselves exceptionally well-funded, and a significant share of their revenue comes not from private donations but from taxpayers.

Most nonprofits are required to file an annual tax return with the IRS called Form 990, disclosing their finances in considerable detail. These forms are publicly available, and using ProPublica’s Nonprofit Explorer, it was possible to locate filings with financial information for just over 600 of the Grants Pass amici. Almost all of these (over 96 percent) covered the calendar year or tax year ending in 2023. For the small number of nonprofits where this was unavailable, the most recent available year was used instead (typically 2022, but in a few cases 2021 or 2024). For simplicity’s sake, these were counted as if they were 2023 revenues.¹²⁰

The combined 2023 revenues of the nonprofits that filed or signed on to amicus briefs supporting the plaintiffs/respondents in Grants Pass totaled over $9.13 billion.

While this number was skewed high by the gargantuan AIDS Healthcare Foundation—which alone accounted for a full quarter of the total—it doesn’t include those groups which could not reasonably be identified or differentiated, nor does it include fiscally-sponsored projects or programs of a nonprofit (such as a university center). It also doesn’t include churches, which, despite being nonprofits, are exempt from the Form 990 filing requirement. Finally, it does not include those nonprofits that filed Form 990-N by virtue of having gross receipts of $50,000 or less.¹²¹

Among the nonprofit amici with available financial data, more than half reported 2023 revenues under $4 million. Others, however, operated at a much larger scale. At least 65 organizations reported revenues of $30 million or more, including 10 that exceeded $100 million. Of those 65, all but three were organized as 501(c)(3) public charities.

The largest was the AIDS Healthcare Foundation, followed by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which reported nearly $170 million in total revenue.¹²² The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), a 501(c)(4), reported over $146 million in 2023 revenue, not including the revenues of its even larger 501(c)(3) affiliate, the ACLU Foundation, nor its network of state affiliates.^{123 124}

Even more interesting—particularly given the public interest currently surrounding government-funded nonprofits—is just how many of the Grants Pass amici receive most of their funding not from voluntary charitable donations, but from the American taxpayer. On Form 990, nonprofits are required to report how much money they receive from government grants, whether local, state, or federal. Adding up the amounts from this line gives a combined total of over $2.9 billion, or 32 percent of the Grants Pass nonprofits’ total 2023 revenue.¹²⁵

This is at least a modest undercount for several reasons. First, some nonprofit churches, such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops (which filed its own amicus brief), receive significant federal funding but are not required to file Form 990. Second, it is generally not possible to determine from Form 990 whether projects or programs of a nonprofit may have received government funding, even if the parent nonprofit (such as a college or university) did.¹²⁶

Finally, some nonprofits report their government grant/contract revenue in unconventional ways, such as by listing it as part of their program service revenue. While the source of these funds is often—though by no means always—reasonably clear, for the sake of consistency and because relatively few nonprofits report in this way, this method was excluded from the above analysis.

All that said, a total of 419 nonprofit amici with supporting respondents in the City of Grants Pass case reported receiving some amount of government funding on their respective 2023 Form 990s. This represents a remarkable 69 percent of all nonprofits for which financials were available and 83 percent of nonprofits reporting at least $4 million in total revenue. Of those nonprofits that reported receiving any government funding, 58 percent received more than half of their total revenue from that source, 32 percent received at least three-quarters, and over 13 percent received 90 percent or more. Whether such high levels of government funding is a good or bad thing in any given case will naturally depend on the specifics.

Still, it is not difficult to understand why some people have suggested that these non-governmental organizations could be more accurately described as “basically governmental organizations.”¹²⁷

Some examples of 501(c)(3) charitable amici in Grants Pass that reported very high levels of government funding in 2023 include LA Family Housing (91 percent of $71.5 million), the Children’s Law Center of California (94 percent of $82.1 million), Disability Rights California (94 percent of $43.6 million), All Chicago Making Homelessness History (97 percent of $62.9 million), Black Veterans for Social Justice (99 percent of $67.9 million), the Defender Association of Philadelphia (99 percent of $83.9 million), and the Illinois Coalition Against Sexual Assault (99 percent of $30.7 million).

Among the Grants Pass amici, the nonprofit with the single highest percentage of government funding was

Nonprofits opposing the use of arrest and fines to address homelessness reported over $9.1 billion in total revenue (2023)

Nonprofits opposing the use of arrest and fines to address homelessness reported over $2.9 billion in government grants (2023)

New York County Defender Services, which reported $22,376,163 in total 2023 revenue, all but $159 of which came from government grants.

Charity or Politics?

A few dozen nonprofits that joined amicus briefs supporting plaintiffs/respondents in Grants Pass were organized as 501(c)(4) social welfare organizations (e.g., Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights), 501(c)(5) labor organizations (e.g., San Francisco Labor Council), or 501(c)(6) business leagues (e.g., National Association of Social Workers). However, the vast majority were 501(c)(3) public charities.^{128,129,130}

What makes the Grants Pass amici striking, however, is not simply their tax status but the tension between public perception and actual practice. Americans tend to associate 501(c)(3) charities with work like sheltering the homeless or running food banks, and many amici indeed provide such services. The Court itself acknowledged their importance in supporting unsheltered individuals.

But that same tax status also applies to a smaller group of amici whose activities are rather less intuitively “charitable.” These organizations focus primarily on advocacy, using litigation, lobbying-adjacent campaigns, and public messaging to advance broader political or ideological agendas. Despite operating under the same tax status as food banks and homeless shelters, their missions frequently stem from highly contested policy debates. Their involvement in Grants Pass underscores how elastic the definition of “charity” has become—and raises difficult questions about where, if anywhere, the boundary should lie.

Consider one brief filed by more than two dozen organizations with a professed interest in California’s (and specifically San Francisco’s) approach to homelessness.¹³¹ It was joined by the National Harm Reduction Coalition, among the most prominent promoters of the eponymous (and controversial) approach to hard drug abuse, which itself is associated with homelessness.^{132,133} The coalition accepts drug abuse “for better or worse” and tells those struggling with addiction that “no one knows what’s best for you better than you. Whatever drugs you use, we want you to be safe and healthy.”^{134 135}

It supports calls to defund the police and claims that “racism drives both homelessness and health inequities,” including the “inhumane” Grants Pass decision.^{136,137} The National Harm Reduction Coalition operates as a 501(c)(3) charity, with a total 2022 revenue of $12.8 million. That year, it derived 73 percent of its funding from government grants.¹³⁸

Also joining the California brief was San Francisco Rising, a fiscally sponsored project of the 501(c)(3) Chinese Progressive Association.^{139,140} Despite its charitable tax status, San Francisco Rising describes itself as an “electoral alliance” working “to build political power with working-class communities of color.”¹⁴¹

PODER SF, an affiliate of San Francisco Rising that also joined the brief, aims to “build political power within targeted electoral districts through community organizing and strategic voter engagement strategies” to create “a powerful statewide progressive voter network.”^{142,143} It is fiscally sponsored by the massive Tides Center, which is also organized as a 501(c)(3) public charity.¹⁴⁴

Another brief was submitted by the Center for Constitutional Rights, a 501(c)(3) charity that reported over $14.8 million in total revenue in 2023.^{145,146,147} An activist litigation group whose mission is to use the law to further left-wing sociopolitical movements, the Center leans heavily into radical causes. This has most disturbingly manifested in the group’s acceptance of terrorism.¹⁴⁸

In an abhorrent same-day response to the October 7, 2023 Hamas-led attacks against Israel, the Center characterized them as “Palestinian armed resistance from occupied Gaza,” referred to what it claimed was “the international legal right of colonized people to resist colonial domination,” and declared that “Palestinian resistance fighters” were within their rights to “carry out attacks on military targets.” Even while Hamas militants were still operating within Israel, the Center for Constitutional Rights was essentially saying that the Israelis deserved it.¹⁴⁹

Presumably aware of this, numerous left-wing groups signed on to the Center for Constitutional Rights’ brief in Grants Pass. One was Black & Pink, a 501(c)(3) charity that reported over $1.8 million in 2023 revenues.¹⁵⁰

¹⁵¹ On its website homepage, Black & Pink declares in all caps that “WE FIGHT TO ABOLISH PRISONS.”¹⁵²

Another was the 501(c)(3) National Women’s Law Center, which asserts that “abortion is love, community, and justice personified,” and that “the fight for abortion access is inextricably tied to the fight for Housing Justice.”^{153,154} Much of the Law Center’s public commentary is devoted simply to attacking the Trump Administration and other elected Republicans.¹⁵⁵ It had $28.3 million in total 2023 revenues.¹⁵⁶ Other activist signatories included the Transgender Law Center, the Human Rights Campaign Foundation, the Drug Policy Alliance, and the Black Alliance for Just Immigration, all of which are organized as 501(c)(3) charities.^{157,158,159,160}

At least nine 501(c)(3) charities that reported receiving more than half of their funding from government grants in 2023 joined the Center for Constitutional Rights’ amicus brief: New York County Defender Services (100 percent), the Sylvia Rivera Law Project (99 percent), the Center for Community Alternatives (82 percent), the Ruth Ellis Center (81 percent), the New York Legal Assistance Group (80 percent), the DC LGBTQ+ Community Center (76 percent), Housing Works, Inc. (69 percent), Rainbow Health Minnesota (66 percent, 2022 financials), and Make the Road New York (50 percent).^{161,162,163}

Make the Road New York—which had 2023 total revenues of over $31.7 million—is another good example of a 501(c)(3) charity that functions as a taxpayer-funded left-wing political activist group, supporting everything from defunding the police to abolishing U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.^{164,165,166} It is also an example of the “megaphone philanthropy” phenomenon, as there is hardly a page on its website that does not feature imagery of protesters yelling into bullhorns and/or marching with signs that read things like “~~Proud~~ Ashamed to be an American” and “Trump is not my President.” For a group that gets half of its funding from the American taxpayer, that is some remarkable messaging to promote.^{167,168,169}

Yet another brief led by Lambda Legal and the Juvenile Law Center was joined by the 501(c)(3) East Bay Community Law Center, which operates a homelessness services program.^{170,171,172,173} Its platform prioritizes “the health, safety, economic, and political needs of women of color” (emphasis added) and specifically calls for universal basic income, universal healthcare, “an enforceable right to housing,” including rent forgiveness and a moratorium on evictions, the cancellation of student loans, the “immediate release of all incarcerated youth,” and the “release and reparations for all ensnared in the failed War on Drugs.” In 2023, the East Bay Community Law Center had total revenues of over $11.1 million, approximately 29 percent of which was from government grants.¹⁷⁴

Homelessness Advocacy Groups

All the nonprofit amici in Grants Pass demonstrated enough institutional interest in homelessness to weigh in before the Supreme Court, but among the more activist-oriented groups, relatively few focus exclusively on homelessness itself. Instead, they treat it as one part of a broader political and ideological agenda. Accordingly, it may be most useful to examine a handful of prominent organizations whose primary mission centers on homelessness or low-income housing.

All are organized as 501(c)(3) charities, and they tend to view homelessness not as the result of personal or situational hardship, but as the inevitable outcome of systemic social and economic injustices. Their policy prescriptions typically involve expansive government intervention and a larger welfare state. These groups also frame their work through the lens of race, gender, sexual orientation, and other identity-based categories. They are often supported by the same network of institutional funders and foundations.

One group that surprisingly did not appear in any of the Grants Pass amicus briefs (though it has strongly criticized the decision) is the National Coalition for the Homeless.¹⁷⁵ Founded back in the 1980s, the National Coalition for the Homeless argues that “structural racism and discrimination are root causes of homelessness” and that “the housing crisis is a symptom of structural inequity, based largely on institutionalized poverty and racism.”^{176 177 178} In 2023, the coalition had total revenues of $1.75 million, with notable grants coming from the Melville Charitable Trust, the Network for Good, the National Football League Foundation, and the Arabella Advisors-managed New Venture Fund.^{179,180,181,182,183,184}

The National Coalition for the Homeless also runs a campaign called Bring America Home NOW, which describes itself as “a comprehensive grassroots campaign to end homelessness in the U.S.”^{185,186} Like its parent, Bring America Home NOW claims that “homelessness is inextricably linked to systemic racism,” and that in order to end it, society must (among other things) guarantee housing as a human right and “ensure livable wages and basic income for all Americans and link income to the local cost of housing.”¹⁸⁷ It claims to have 680 coalition partners, though only a little over 200 are listed on its website.¹⁸⁸

These groups run the gamut, with nonprofits, for-profits, and government entities all represented. Many deal more or less entirely with issues related to homelessness and/or housing, but some do not. Some are service providers, while others are activist groups. Among the latter, there is some minor overlap with the Grants Pass amici.

One group appearing on both lists is the National Homelessness Law Center, which engages in both policy advocacy and litigation, often with a distinctly political flavor. For example, in soliciting donations for its “Fight Back Fund,” it accuses “Donald Trump and his billionaire allies” of pushing an “anti-homeless, anti-Black, anti-poor, anti-immigrant, and anti-LGBTQ agenda.”¹⁸⁹

The Law Center operates a joint campaign with the National Coalition for the Homeless called Housing Not Handcuffs, which is yet another coalition of public officials (including Obama Administration attorney general Eric Holder) and approximately 270 local, state, and national organizations that oppose what they call the “criminalization of homelessness.”^{190,191,192} The National Homelessness Law Center is organized as a 501(c)(3) charity, and in 2023, it reported $2.16 million in total revenue.¹⁹³ It counts numerous prominent American law firms among its supporters, alongside private foundations such as the Annie E. Casey Foundation and the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation.^{194,195,196}

There is also the National Low Income Housing Coalition, which is a 501(c)(3) charity that had 2023 revenues of just over $23 million.^{197,198} Its mission is to achieve a

“racially and socially equitable public policy that ensures people with the lowest incomes have quality homes that are accessible and affordable in communities of their choice.”¹⁹⁹

While the coalition contends that a lack of affordable housing primarily causes homelessness, it also acknowledges that half of the unsheltered homeless population suffers from “a combination of physical, mental, and substance use conditions.”²⁰⁰

Despite this, it criticizes sobriety requirements at homeless shelters and supports the controversial Harm Reduction approach to substance abuse.²⁰¹ The coalition blames racial disparities in homelessness on “centuries of structural racism” intended to harm minorities and asserts that “the future of housing” lies in a concept it calls “Inclusion, Diversity, Equity, Anti-racism, and Systems-thinking (IDEAS),” through which it seeks to “build a racially and socially equitable society where everyone has a quality, accessible, and affordable home.”^{202,203}

In 2023, the National Low Income Housing Coalition received a massive $15.1 million grant from the Chicago Community Trust, which dwarfed the group’s entire annual revenue from the year before.²⁰⁴ Other recent significant funders have included the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation, the Freedom Together Foundation (formerly known as the JPB Foundation), the New Venture Fund, and the GS Donor Advised Philanthropy Fund for Wealth Management (formerly known as the Goldman Sachs Philanthropy Fund).^{205,206,207}

Yet another prominent advocacy group is the National Alliance to End Homelessness, whose mission is “preventing and ending homelessness in the United States” through “equitable, socially just, and evidence-based strategies and policies.”^{208,209} It argues that homelessness is “primarily the result of structural drivers”—namely, the “systemic discrimination and marginalization” of minority communities by the government—though it also blames climate change and insists that “climate justice” must be prioritized in efforts to address homelessness.^{210,211} The Alliance supports the “decommodification of housing,” such as through government rent control and social housing, alongside higher levels of direct federal funding for housing assistance and services.^{212,213}

The National Alliance to End Homelessness is a 501(c)(3) organization, and it reported over $7.6 million in total revenue in 2023.²¹⁴ Large organizational funders that year included the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation ($2,566,625), the Melville Charitable Trust ($360,000), and the Oak Foundation ($350,000).^{215,216} Jeff Bezos is also listed as a $500,000+ donor in the alliance's annual report for that year.^{217,218}

The National Health Care for the Homeless Council, which is the self-described “premier national organization working at the nexus of homelessness and health care,” also supports left-of-center public policy initiatives.²¹⁹ Arguing that “contemporary homelessness is the product of conscious social and economic policy decisions that have retreated from a commitment to ensuring basic life necessities for all people,” the National Health Care for the Homeless Council’s core policy principles include universal healthcare, “affordable housing regardless of income,” government-mandated “livable wages for persons able to work,” and an end to what it calls “the criminalization of poverty and homelessness.”^{220,221} The National Health Care for the Homeless Council is a 501(c)(3) organization that reported total 2023 revenues of $9.1 million, 58 percent of which came from government grants.²²²

Finally, there is Funders Together for Housing Justice (previously Funders Together to End Homelessness), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit research advocacy group, which claims to be “the only philanthropic membership organization devoted to Housing Justice in the United States.” It illustrates how even seemingly mainstream 501(c)(3) charities can harbor deeply radical views.^{223,224}

In 2023, Funders Together had total revenues of over $2.8 million. Large funders that year included the Melville Charitable Trust ($300,000), the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation ($275,000), the Northwest Area Foundation ($260,000), the Allstate Foundation ($170,000), and the Raikes Foundation ($160,000).^{225,226} Funders Together claims to work closely with the National Alliance to End Homelessness, the National Homelessness

Law Center, the National Low Income Housing Coalition, and the National Health Care for the Homeless Council, in addition to the American Bar Association, the Urban Institute, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and many other organizations.^{227,228,229,230}

Funders Together’s vision is to highlight what it alleges is “the legacy of racism” in housing and homelessness and to “reimagine and transform systems to be Pro-Black and Pro-Indigenous using an intersectional lens to achieve housing and racial justice.”²³¹ It believes that “homelessness is a racialized experience created and exacerbated by the forces of structural racism,” and claims that “white supremacy has intentionally limited growth and opportunities” for minority communities in the United States. In pursuit of what it calls “housing abundance,” Funders Together supports government reparations “in the form of money and land” as compensation for what it says are the “intentional and ongoing projects of slavery and subjugation” in the United States.²³²

The global economy, according to Funders Together, is similarly built upon “racial capitalism,” which supposedly leverages “racial exploitation to facilitate capital accumulation.”²³³ A so-called “liberated society” can only be achieved through what amounts to a socialist welfare state, in which “everyone’s basic needs are met in full.” Funders Together aims to “decommodify” the housing sector, replacing it with Green New Deal-style public housing.²³⁴

The Blurred Boundaries of Charity

This analysis of the amici who supported the plaintiffs and respondents in Grants Pass highlights several important points about nonprofits in general and specifically about charities. First, despite the many different legal categories of nonprofits, the sector is dominated by 501(c)(3) public charities and private foundations. Second, while there is obviously significant variation, the charitable sector is tremendously wealthy. Third, a remarkably large number of charities receive most of their revenue not from voluntary donations, but rather from taxpayers via government grants and contracts. Finally, it seems likely that many Americans would perceive a genuine qualitative difference between those 501(c)(3)s that operate traditionally “charitable” programs in which they directly serve the needy versus those that engage primarily in public policy advocacy. Such activism can be distinctly political in character and occasionally veers in radical directions.

Does this align with the public’s understanding of what “charity” should be? Would it be possible to do more to protect the charitable sector from the taint of our divisive political climate and rhetoric? Addressing homelessness is especially important because the charitable sector plays a critical role in the lives of society’s most vulnerable.

What the City of Grants Pass v Johnson Reveals

The City of Grants Pass v. Johnson decision pulled back the curtain on more than just a constitutional dispute over local authority. It exposed the sheer scale and reach of a nonprofit sector where “charity” often means something very different from what the public imagines. Hundreds of organizations—most structured as 501(c)(3) charities and many heavily subsidized by taxpayer dollars—mobilized not to provide shelter or treatment, but to advance a set of policy and ideological priorities.

At the core of these priorities sit frameworks such as Housing First, Harm Reduction, and Housing Justice. Each is framed in humanitarian terms, yet their application within the Grants Pass amici network illustrates how advocacy can eclipse aid. Housing First, for instance, has become the dominant paradigm, promoted as the only acceptable response to homelessness despite mixed evidence about its long-term effectiveness. Harm reduction, once a clinical strategy, has been broadened into a policy stance that can normalize non-intervention. And the rhetoric of Housing Justice—rooted in systemic critiques of capitalism and policing—pushes the debate beyond shelter provision into the realm of broader social transformation.

The result is a sector in which public sympathy for homelessness is leveraged to advance political objectives, sometimes radical in orientation. The Grants Pass amici exemplify this shift: large, well-funded organizations, many dependent on government grants and contracts, aligning with grassroots networks and activist coalitions to shape legal and policy outcomes. What might appear as charity in the public eye often functions as lobbying by another name—backed not by voluntary giving alone, but by public subsidies.

This raises urgent policy questions. When taxpayer-funded nonprofits dedicate substantial resources to shaping constitutional law and lobbying against enforcement measures, are they still serving the charitable mission the tax code envisions? How should policymakers and the public distinguish between groups that deliver immediate relief—shelter, treatment, pathways to self-sufficiency—and those that pursue ideological goals under the same legal umbrella?

The Grants Pass case does not answer these questions, but it crystallizes them. It shows how debates over homelessness are not only about tents and ordinances but also about the proper role of the nonprofit sector in American civic life. As the sector continues to expand, scrutiny and accountability become essential. Without them, well-meaning public resources risk fueling activism at the expense of aid, leaving both the homeless and the communities they inhabit without the support and solutions they urgently need.

Bridging the Analysis: The Overlap of Grants Pass Advocacy and Radical Networks

The City of Grants Pass v. Johnson case was pivotal not only for its constitutional implications but also because it brought together, in one docket, the largest assembly of organizations operating in the homelessness policy space. The amicus filings created a snapshot of the sector, offering unparalleled visibility into the actors that comprise what this report identifies as the “homelessness industrial complex.”

Importantly, the groups represented in the litigation were not solely direct service providers; they were organizations willing to invest in advocacy, policy, and litigation strategies—revealing the degree to which the sector is shifting toward shaping law and public policy rather than simply delivering aid. Our research uncovered dozens of organizations that began as direct service providers and increasingly shifted toward advocacy.

But, it is when these amicus filers overlaid with the entities that the next section identifies as having extremist alignments, we see a troubling pattern emerging. Their dual position—participating in litigation at the Supreme Court level while also aligning with movements rooted in anti-police, anti-capitalist, or pro-terrorist narratives—demonstrates that the overlap is not incidental. Rather, it shows that elements of the homelessness industrial complex is both engaged in shaping American policy and permeated by ideological currents that extend well beyond housing policy.

This convergence underscores that the Grants Pass litigation should not be viewed only as a contest over enforcement practices. It was also a revealing test case for how direct service providers merge with advocacy coalitions—funded in large part by government grants and philanthropic support—which then carry broader ideological frameworks into the policymaking process. It further underscores the urgent need to reassess how public and private resources are allocated, monitored, and leveraged within the homelessness response ecosystem. Understanding this intersection provides critical context for examining the ideological capture explored in Part III and raises fundamental questions about the nature and direction of modern homelessness advocacy.

Viewed in this light, the litigation campaign around Grants Pass cannot be understood in isolation; it is one facet of a broader ideological project. The next section turns directly to those extremist networks, tracing how they operate within the American advocacy landscape and how their convergence with the “homelessness industrial complex” has reshaped both the substance of homelessness policy and the institutions that administer it.

EXTREMISTS HIJACKING THE FIGHT AGAINST HOMELESSNESS

A surprising conduit for anti-American extremism has emerged: the housing justice movement, a network of organizations originally formed to combat homelessness. What began as a call to provide shelter and support for vulnerable populations has, in many cases, transformed into a political movement driven more by ideology than by practical solutions.

Instead of focusing on proven interventions—such as mental health treatment, job training, and transitional housing—many groups within this space have shifted toward advocacy, policy activism, and ideological campaigns. They argue that housing is a human right that must be guaranteed by the state without conditions. Some go further, framing homelessness as a direct result of systemic racism, capitalism, and American imperialism.

This narrative has created an opening for radical actors. Activist groups with roots in Marxist, anarchist, and even Islamist ideologies have found a foothold within homelessness coalitions, using their influence to advance causes that extend far beyond housing. The result is a movement that, in certain segments, has become more concerned with dismantling perceived systems of oppression than with helping individuals off the streets.

The shift became particularly visible in the wake of the October 7, 2023 Hamas-led terrorist attacks against Israel. In response, several left-wing advocacy organizations—including those involved in homelessness policy—issued statements condemning Israel while downplaying or excusing the violence. These responses exposed a deeper trend: extremist organizations are leveraging their roles in housing coalitions to push radical, often anti-American agendas. This chapter investigates how and why this has happened. It identifies the advocacy groups promoting extremist rhetoric, maps the coalitions they influence, and uses their own words to show how efforts meant to serve the homeless have been co-opted for political ends that have little to do with getting people the help they need.

Exploiting Good Intentions

The Housing Justice movement stems from the broader and more diverse homelessness advocacy embodied by proponents of the “Housing First” policy. Discovery Institute — a 501(c)(3) nonprofit with a program dedicated to addressing the homelessness crisis and a record of questioning Housing First's effectiveness — defines the policy as follows:

The policy maintains that homelessness is fundamentally a housing issue that can be addressed by building additional housing. Proponents insist that housing is the main barrier to addiction and mental illness treatment, and that if individuals are provided with housing through taxpayer-funded housing vouchers, they will then be able to choose and focus on recovery for themselves. Per HUD and Housing First philosophy, treatment and program participation requirements cannot be mandatory. Housing First policy was formally adopted by the Federal Government under the Obama Administration in 2013.^{235,236,237}

Funders Together for Housing Justice explains how “Housing Justice” is more ideological in nature:

Housing is a fundamental human right.

Housing justice is a building block for racial justice and liberation. A just housing society offers the assurance of safe, secure, affordable, and dignified living conditions where people have power and agency over how and where they live.

Housing justice recognizes that for generations equitable access to housing has been denied to Black and Indigenous people and other communities of color, which has fueled the disproportionate numbers of Black and other people of color experiencing homelessness.

By pursuing housing justice, Funders Together is unapologetically stating that homelessness is a racialized experience created and exacerbated by the forces of structural racism. Funders Together advocates for corrective action, such as reparations, to address the cumulative disparities and transform systems of accountability to ensure housing for all.²³⁸

framework, arguing that the root cause lies in the structural injustices of America's political and economic systems. From this perspective, actions such as clearing encampments or mandating addiction treatment are not seen as necessary interventions, but rather as extensions of systemic oppression.

At the same time, Housing First—a policy approach that prioritizes permanent housing for unhoused individuals without requiring treatment or sobriety—has gained widespread support, largely on moral and humanitarian grounds. Yet the Discovery Institute's FixHomelessness.org initiative has found that, in practice, Housing First policies often fail to reduce homelessness and may even worsen it, all while consuming significant public resources. The result, critics argue, is a morally questionable use of funding on programs with poor track records of success.

Several U.S. states have begun to echo those concerns. In 2023, Florida enacted HB 1267, which bars state homelessness funds from being used on Housing First initiatives, citing persistently high levels of unsheltered homelessness despite major investments.²³⁹ Utah passed SB 238 to prioritize programs that require participants to engage in behavioral health or substance use treatment. Georgia followed with legislation that emphasizes transitional housing and links funding to measurable reductions in street homelessness.²⁴⁰

While several states have already moved away from Housing First, Missouri's action is especially notable. In 2022, Missouri enacted House Bill 1606 (H.B. 1606), which formally abandoned the Housing First model by shifting funding away from permanent supportive housing toward short-term housing and mandatory treatment options.²⁴¹

Although Missouri's Supreme Court later struck down H.B. 1606 on procedural grounds in late 2023—invali- dating the criminal penalties and funding restrictions—it remains a landmark example of legislative resistance to Housing First. The episode underscores a broader pattern: states are increasingly questioning not just the effectiveness, but the ideological underpinnings of unconditional housing strategies.

These state-level policy shifts signal a broader national reevaluation of homelessness strategies—one increasingly skeptical of unconditional housing models. This emerging skepticism stands in stark contrast to the approach of many Housing Justice advocates, whose messaging around Housing First has become more ideological and polarizing.

By framing housing not just as a social need but as a right denied by oppressive systems, parts of the Housing Justice movement have created an ideological entry point for radical factions. Extremist groups—including anarchists, Marxists, and Islamists—have found common cause with this narrative, using homelessness not as a humanitarian crisis to be solved, but as a platform for broader revolutionary goals.

The Art of Coalitions

Revolutionary elements within the Housing Justice movement have advanced their position by exploiting what Hamas’s parent group, the Muslim Brotherhood, describes as a “mastery of the art of coalitions.” This strategy mirrors Sun Tzu’s emphasis on adaptability, strategic alignment, and long-term positioning over open confrontation. Coalition-building allows actors with radical commitments to embed themselves in broader alliances, borrow legitimacy from more established organizations, and steadily redirect agendas. By aligning with commendable homelessness service providers – many of whom have expanded into advocacy, policy, and litigation—often under the banner of moral urgency—these movements gain credibility and momentum that would be unattainable on their own.

The Grants Pass case highlighted how this dynamic works in practice. Service-oriented nonprofits joined with advocacy organizations in filing amicus briefs, presenting a unified front that positioned them not only as caretakers but as policy-shapers. Within this coalition, a subset of groups identified in this report also intersect with extremist networks, showing how the coalition model provides radicals with cover and access. Marxist, anarchist, and Islamist-aligned actors have openly described how they use this strategy: build alliances with diverse partners, absorb overlapping causes, and project cohesion that magnifies their influence. In doing so, they bend the discourse of homelessness advocacy toward radical ends disproportionate to their numbers.

Islamists in Their Own Words

The Muslim Brotherhood’s U.S. wing wrote an internal strategic memo in 1991 that has since become public.²⁴²

The Brotherhood outlined its self-described “settlement mission” in the U.S. (a rather ironic terminology considering its condemnations of Israel and the U.S. as illegitimate “settler-colonialist” occupations).

It described its mission as a “kind of Grand Jihad in eliminating and destroying the Western civilization from within and ‘sabotaging’ its miserable house by their hands and the hands of the believers.”

Because the memo is authored in the first person, it is clear that “their hands” is a reference to using the hands of Americans and Westerners against themselves. One of the “key” ways of doing so is practicing the “mastery of ‘the art of coalitions,’ the art of ‘absorption,’ and the principles of ‘cooperation’” (U.S. v. Holy Land Foundation, Government Exhibit GX3-85, 2008).

If you examine the makeup of almost any “social justice” coalition, including homeless advocacy ones, you’ll see pro-Hamas, Brotherhood-inspired groups like the Council on American-Islamic Relations 501(c)(3) nonprofit and American Muslims for Palestine, a project of the Americans for Justice in Palestine Educational Foundation 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{243,244,245}

Per the Muslim Brotherhood leadership’s own words, we know that Islamist extremists invest in these alliances because they are stepping stones for building an eventual revolutionary insurgency.

This framework underscores why the patterns of ideological overlap and coalition-building among activist groups—including those engaged in homelessness advocacy—warrant serious scrutiny. This dynamic is not theoretical; it surfaces in real-world coalitions that bring together Islamist-aligned organizations, racial-justice movements, and housing-justice networks.

Organizations we classify in this report as Islamism-aligned, including the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) and American Muslims for Palestine (AMP), regularly appear in broader social-justice coalitions. CAIR has publicly aligned with and participated in Black Lives Matter (BLM) actions, issuing BLM solidarity statements and joining BLM-led demonstrations at the chapter level (e.g., CAIR-NY, CAIR-Chicago, CAIR-Houston).

CAIR's connection to the homeless industrial complex is not in dispute. A few examples include:

- CAIR's Sacramento Valley office promoted and participated in the Poor People's Campaign stop in Sacramento and named CAIR-SV civil-rights attorney Saad Sweilem as a townhall speaker. The Poor People's Campaign's radical agenda includes homeless/housing policy.²⁴⁶
- CAIR Pittsburgh called for law enforcement reform that includes getting them out of homeless/housing issues.²⁴⁷
- CAIR Philadelphia praised one of its board members as an advocate in "prison reform and homelessness."²⁴⁸
- A board member of CAIR California served as Senior Advisor of Homelessness to Governor Newsom's cabinet & previously served as a top homeless policy official for San Diego.²⁴⁹
- CAIR New York, CAIR Chicago, and the national CAIR have partnered with BLM (e.g., the Movement for Black Lives, M4BL) in local housing-justice and "defund the police"^{250,251,252}

M4BL's platform explicitly links housing to pro-Hamas, racial capitalism, policing, and incarceration, and advances a dedicated "Housing and Healthcare for All" plank. Within the housing-justice space, the Right to the City Alliance (RTTC) is a national coalition whose stated mission includes halting displacement and resisting police and state harassment in tenant communities—positions that overlap with BLM-aligned narratives.^{253,254}

Notably, Alicia Garza—best known as a co-founder of BLM—was elected as board chair of RTTC in 2011, illustrating personnel and narrative proximity between BLM leadership and RTTC's housing-justice organizing. Since 2011, Garza has advanced initiatives that echo RTTC's housing-justice and anti-policing themes. She co-founded Black Lives Matter in 2013, amplifying campaigns that pair "divest-from-policing/invest-in-communities" with calls for affordable housing and tenant protections via the Movement for Black Lives policy platform.²⁵⁵

In 2018, she launched the Black Futures Lab (BFL), which produced the Black Census Project and policy agendas tying Black voters' priorities to housing access and public-safety reforms (e.g., Black Agenda 2020; 2024 Black Economic Agenda).²⁵⁶ BFL's 2023–24 Black Census work and follow-on releases explicitly elevate affordable housing as a top priority for Black voters and argue for government action—positions that align with RTTC's "Freedom from Police & State Harassment" and anti-displacement mission.²⁵⁷ Garza has also publicly framed defund-to-reinvest in terms of redirecting resources from police responses to housing and community services, reinforcing the invest/divest logic common to BLM-aligned housing campaigns.²⁵⁸ In 2009, Garza served as executive director of People Organized to Win Employment Rights (POWER). In 2015, POWER merged into Causa Justa :: Just Cause, an RTTC member organization, which helps explain the continuing network proximity between Garza's orbit and RTTC's tenant-organizing lane (despite her serving as chair for just one year). Later in this section we will examine the Right to the City Alliance in greater detail, including its coalition strategies, funding ties, and political alignment.

Given the Muslim Brotherhood's own stated emphasis on coalition-building and the visible linkages between Islamist-aligned organizations and broader social justice networks—including those addressing homelessness—it is not unreasonable to raise concerns about ideological cross-pollination. Their participation in overlapping coalitions provides them with influence over narratives, language, and ultimately, policy agendas.

Marxists in Their Own Words

The strategy of ideological infiltration is not exclusive to Islamist actors. Established Marxist–Leninist organizations in the U.S. have also openly sought to use social justice movements as vehicles for influence and legitimacy. One of the clearest examples is the Party for Socialism and Liberation (PSL), a U.S.-based group that actively participates in political campaigns, protest movements, and organizing efforts. Foreign terrorist organizations as well have openly declared their intent to use social justice movements as vehicles for influence and legitimacy. One of the clearest examples is the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), a Marxist-Leninist terrorist group that participated in the Hamas-led October 7 attacks.²⁵⁹

Among the more than the 150 pro-terror groups active in the anti-Israel protest movement, which were identified in Capital Research Center’s Marching Toward Violence Report, the PFLP arguably wields greater influence than Hamas itself.²⁶⁰ This is because PFLP has made deliberate efforts to engage U.S.-based activist groups. In 2015, it held a formal meeting with the International Action Center (IAC), a registered 501(c)(3) nonprofit.²⁶¹ The PFLP stated the meeting aimed to deepen collaboration “between the Palestinian Arab left and progressive and democratic forces in the United States.”²⁶²

The IAC, which identifies as Marxist-Leninist, openly advances an anti-capitalist and anti-American agenda, including campaigns demanding “affordable housing.” It is also among the U.S.-based groups flagged in Capital Research Center’s analysis of pro-terrorist activism within the anti-Israel protest movement.²⁶³

Similarly, the Palestinian Popular Struggle Front (PPSF), a Marxist political party, responded to the October 7 attacks by calling upon “communist, socialist, and leftist progressive parties in the world” to support the Palestinian “resistance.”²⁶⁴ The PPSF boasts of its success in mobilizing the “global progressive movement” and holds formal affiliations with the Progressive Alliance—alongside the Democratic Party—and consultative membership in Socialist International.^{265,266,267}

The language used by these organizations is intentionally broad. Their appeals to “progressive” and “leftist” groups are designed to draw in allies across a wide range of domestic causes—not limited to Middle East policy. To engage with groups not explicitly focused on foreign affairs, they must embed themselves within those groups’ existing advocacy missions.

Homelessness and Housing Justice are increasingly viewed as such strategic entry points.

Anarchist Coalition Strategy

Anarchist groups like Antifa show up in political movements, but they almost never run their own nonprofits. They tend to see the nonprofit world as too dependent on big donors and government money, which they think takes away real independence.²⁶⁸

One group of anarchists from a “Stop the Sweeps” group in Texas wrote an article in November 2024 explaining how they radicalized the Housing Justice movement and utilized it to facilitate their independent militant actions “defending” homeless encampments from police.

“We developed a way of acting that emphasized autonomous principles without explicitly flagging ourselves as anarchists,” they wrote in their article tellingly titled, “Insurgent Survival.”²⁶⁹

By adopting deceptive names that sound innocuous and are unassociated with anarchism, they were able to “push the tactical repertoire of the movement without entering into direct conflict with other factions or alienating potential collaborators.”

The anarchists explained how they benefited from the “Homes Not Handcuffs” (HNH) campaign by attending HNH meetings, specifically the breakout sessions related to “sweeps defense.” The result was that “we ultimately absorbed the sweeps defense group into our efforts.” The coalition meetings served as their recruitment ground.²⁷⁰

Humanitarian efforts at homeless encampments, particularly providing meals, was “a chance to build a foundation for trust so as to collaborate in more militant sweep defense or combative activity around other issues.”

Their involvement in the HNH coalition also gave them access to inside information about city council members and meetings and “pressure points and information about the effects of our actions on the departments enacting the sweeps.” The anarchists say they were able to “produce scandals as a means of shaping the demands that [HNH] brought to City Council, which enabled us to exert influence on the negotiations without participating in them.”

One pro-Hamas 501(c)(4) nonprofit in the coalition, the Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), was used to access coalition resources. DSA’s Libertarian Socialist Caucus used the coalition’s contact lists to email and call Housing Justice supporters and encourage them to go to the homeless encampments that the anarchists planned to physically defend from the police.²⁷¹

DSA applauded the October 7 attacks, praising “the just armed resistance in Palestine” for its “struggle against American imperialism.”²⁷² The group even cheered on Iran’s direct missile and drone attacks on Israel, stating, “the Iranian defensive strikes have helped to further undermine the mantle of invincibility which the Zionist project has constructed.”²⁷³

It should be noted that the youth wing of DSA is currently listed as one of NCH’s partners for its “Bring America Home Now” initiative.²⁷⁴

Seeing the value in “cross-pollination across different groups and fronts of the struggle,” the anarchists decided to “increase the coordination and strategic intelligence of the movement” by forming a fusion center dubbed “The Hive.”

The fusion center facilitated cooperation between Housing Justice “nonprofits, self-organized homeless collectives, the street newspapers, DSA, mutual aid groups, tenant organizers, and harm reduction groups.” The Stop the Sweeps anarchists also “pull[ed] in friends from anti-fascist [Antifa] and anti-police organizing.”

Later, “[t]his network also leaped into action with the George Floyd Rebellion” and other confrontations with the government and landlords that intend to “undermine and fragment the forces of the state and capital.”

In addition to broadening its own coalition of extremists outside of the nonprofit sector, the anarchists were able to influence the more mainstream coalitions that mostly consist of nonprofits.

“As the only group still actively following, resisting, and shaping the narrative around the sweeps, we were able to shift the movement towards a more radical position,” they wrote.

And what comes next?

The anarchists advise their comrades to “join forces with the forms of insurgent self-organization that emerge, such as encampments and migrant caravans.”

The authors then specifically tell them to join the anti-Israel and oftentimes pro-terrorism “solidarity encampments on college campuses in the United States.”

The extremist elements within the Housing Justice movement have done exactly that.

Case Study: Autonomous Tenants Union Network (ATUN)

Building on coalition tactics, the anarchist group perhaps most active in practicing this methodology is the Autonomous Tenants Union Network (ATUN), which hasn't attempted to conceal the fact that its branding of "tenants unions" fighting for "tenants' rights" is a ploy.

ATUN's website explains that its identification as a "tenants union" is merely a ruse:

We define a tenant as anyone who does not have control over their housing. For us, "tenants" includes unhoused tenants, tenants who are squatting, tenants inside the carceral punishment system, tenants in nursing homes, in university housing, and in state institutions...

...We believe in the right to housing, the right to the city, and the right to stay put. We fight for a world without landlords and without rent. We fight to build tenant power in order to end the immiseration of the poor and working classes that housing represents under capitalism and to contribute to the struggle to end capitalism itself.

ATUN says it sees itself as part of a global revolution:

We stand in solidarity with tenants in struggle around the world. We insist that tenants share interests across borders and we seek to build tenant power accordingly. We strive to adhere to an internationalist and anti-imperialist orientation in words and deeds.

It also writes North America in quotes to signify that it rejects the legitimacy of the countries on the continent. In other words, the U.S. shouldn't exist and should be abolished in order to end "the ongoing theft of Indigenous lands and genocide of Indigenous peoples."

ATUN's desire to extinguish the U.S. is confirmed in an Instagram post by ATUN member Los Angeles Tenants Union in April 2024. It promotes protests for their various issues, specifically "housing for all," "Free Palestine," "abolish colonial borders and the US war machine," and "stop US intervention in Cuba, Venezuela, Nicaragua, Haiti."²⁷⁵

Tenants and Neighborhoods Council, a member of ATUN, says it is a part of the same struggle as the Native Americans who fought colonialists, blacks who attacked former slave-owning landlords, and other violent actors.²⁷⁶

"[W]e should ready ourselves to disrupt state actions that defend the ruling classes as well as the political organizations and actions of those classes themselves," its website reads.

The group doesn't explicitly identify as anarchist, communist, or anarcho-communist, but ATUN's language is unmistakably of that mold. Anarchists promote ATUN as an organization that embodies their views.

A Chicago-based anarchist group, the Autonomous Tenants Union, described how it was formed "to complement the pioneering work of" ATUN. The anarchist group mentions receiving regular training and guidance from the national network.²⁷⁷

One of the organizers of the Los Angeles Tenants Union, a member of ATUN, identified as communist in a December 2024 interview. She said, "My dream is that one day not only [my tenant union] but all these tenants unions become communist."^{278 279}

An issue of ATUN's newsletter highlights how the Greater Boston Tenants Union, an ATUN member, participated in an anti-Israel rally. The article acknowledges their communist ideology.²⁸⁰

"As communists, we know that struggles for liberation around the world are all connected, but in the case of Palestine and the US these connections are especially direct," one of the demonstrators is quoted as saying.

It then mentions how the tenant union infrastructure enables these activists to "more effectively participate in disrupting the flow of resources from our neighborhoods to Israel."

The Milwaukee Autonomous Tenants Union, an ATUN member, published an anti-American statement that refers to “the alleged evils of communism.”^{281 282}

Stomp Out Slumlords, a Washington D.C.-based member of ATUN that is also part of the Democratic Socialists of America, said in August 2023 that its activism for tenants and housing was part of its quest to implement communism:

We’re not going to get to communism without moving people to talk to their neighbors first, and more importantly, doing it ourselves. Here in DC, exercising tenant purchase rights or pushing for rent freezes aren’t going to immediately decommodify housing, true. But these are the small-scale sites of disruption from which we can build working-class power into something much bigger.²⁸³

Endorsements of Terrorism

The Chicago-based Autonomous Tenants Union reacted to the October 7 atrocities by indirectly endorsing the attacks. It said it “stands with all peoples fighting for liberation, including the Palestinian people” without condemning the attacks. Above the statement is artwork glorifying violence and the destruction of police vehicles with, “Decolonize Palestine!” written above it.²⁸⁴

The statement recommended that readers interested in “accurate reporting on Palestine” follow the pro-terrorism media outlets Al-Jazeera and Quds News Network.²⁸⁵ It encourages aspiring activists to get involved through the pro-terrorism U.S. Palestinian Community Network, a fiscally sponsored project of the WESPAC Foundation, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit, and Jewish Voice for Peace, another pro-terrorism 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{286 287 288}

The larger ATUN, its members and its affiliates are frequently involved in anti-Israel protests and use Housing Justice rhetoric to depict Israel as an oppressive landlord that abuses Palestinian tenants and is responsible for Palestinian homelessness in Gaza.²⁸⁹

For example, a joint post published by ATUN member Los Angeles Tenants Union and the pro-terrorism Marxist group, Party for Socialism and Liberation on December 6, 2023, stated:

The same capitalist forces that evict Palestinians from their neighborhoods in Sheikh Jarrah are the same capitalist forces that displace families in Los Angeles! Working people reject Zionism & landlordism- we demand money for housing & education- not for war & occupation!^{290,291}

The terrorists’ destruction of Israeli homes, including burning them down with people inside, and Hamas’s decision to deliberately provoke Palestinian suffering, including homelessness, goes unmentioned by ATUN and the broader Housing Justice movement.²⁹²

Another pro-Hamas anarchist group linked to ATUN is the Black Rose/Rosa Negra Anarchist Federation. It is a supporter of Palestinian terrorism that brags about its involvement in riots.^{293,294} The group says its anarchist militants “have also participated in” ATUN and “built and participated in autonomous tenant unions around the US.” It recommends that those in need of a tenant union join ATUN.²⁹⁵

The San Francisco-based Tenant and Neighborhood Councils, an ATUN affiliate, stated in its November 2023 newsletter that “we stand with working-class tenants who have resisted imperialist violence, whether those in Palestine facing violent displacement by Israeli settlers or those living in the Bay Area and larger United States due to Western intervention, war, and extraction in the third world.”²⁹⁶

It framed October 7 as a response to abuse by capitalist landlords and urged Housing Justice supporters to join the campaign against Israel and the U.S.:

“TANC demands an end to the occupation of Palestine and an end to U.S. collaboration with Zionist Israel on the backs of workers’ hard-earned dollars. Workers and tenants must resist Zionist propaganda, organize against eviction globally, and oppose U.S. imperialism.”

ATUN member Los Angeles Tenants Union publicly sided with the perpetrators of the October 7 attacks in an Instagram post co-authored with its sub-chapter named Union de Vecinos. It declared, “As tenants resisting displacement in LA, we stand in full support of the Palestinian resistance.”^{297,298}

The organization itself endorsed a major pro-terrorism conference in Detroit in May 2024 called the People’s Conference for Palestine.²⁹⁹ The event’s speakers consistently expressed support for the October 7 attacks, Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad, the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, the Houthis and Hezbollah. The lineup even included members of the Marxist-Leninist PFLP terrorist group that took part in the October 7 atrocities.³⁰⁰

Although ATUN has not explicitly endorsed violence in the U.S., its language implies that violence is a legitimate course of action. Members and affiliates of ATUN have justified Palestinian terrorist attacks by drawing parallels between the oppression of Palestinians and the conditions faced by tenants in the U.S.—implicitly suggesting that similar acts of violence could be seen as justified within the American housing struggle.

For instance: In a 2023 communication, the Greater Boston Tenants Union wrote:

Our struggle in Boston is deeply intertwined with the Palestinian liberation struggle...Stopping this flow [of capital] requires U.S. cities and land to be used for people, not profit, which can only be won by a militant, independent tenant movement.³⁰¹

Additionally, the Los Angeles Tenants Union claimed that the October 7 “resistance” is “connected to our resistance here in LA” because they both have abusive landlords and are being pushed out of their homes.³⁰²

If the Palestinians’ violent response counts as legitimate “resistance,” then people in the U.S. facing the same injustices would be justified in reacting the same way.

Another ATUN member, the Greater Boston Tenants Union, wrote on December 5, 2023, “For 75 years, Palestinians have shown us the way to fight back.”³⁰³

ATUN’s advocacy of illegal obstructions of justice is stated more directly. Its resources page has an Eviction Blockade Checklist that includes plans for impeding law enforcement and occupying the inside of the apartment.³⁰⁴

Stomp Out Slumlords, which is affiliated with both ATUN and the Democratic Socialists of America, wrote in 2023 that it had come close to adopting a militant posture. Its decision to remain non-violent, it explained, was not rooted in a rejection of violence but in pragmatism:

In the previous months we had seriously considered the possibility that we would have to physically resist mass evictions like the Communist militants of the 1930s. Once it became clear that the federal government was actually spending money to bail tenants out, we understood we needed to carry out a less dramatic but equally important struggle to ensure tenants actually got that money.³⁰⁵

ATUN's Links to Housing Justice Coalitions and Nonprofits

ATUN eschews the formation of nonprofit organizations, claiming that receiving funding from major foundations or the government would jeopardize its independence.³⁰⁶ It funds itself through donations and membership dues sent to an entity called Tenant Information Network, Inc.³⁰⁷

However, just like the aforementioned “Stop the Sweeps” anarchists in Texas, ATUN says it still works with nonprofits within the Housing Justice movement.

Democratic Socialists of America's Links to ATUN

ATUN and Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), a 501(c)(4) nonprofit organization, have overlapping membership.³⁰⁸

The Metro DC chapter of DSA also goes by the name of Stomp Out Slumlords (SOS) and identifies itself as “Metro DSA’s tenant organizing project.”^{309 310} SOS also appears on ATUN’s list of members.³¹¹

SOS’s website proudly features a 2021 quote from the American Conservative describing them as “deeply radical, even revolutionary, and they want to change America in ways that would make it unrecognizable. They’re serious about it and we should take them seriously.”

The fall 2024 issue of ATUN’s newsletter, the Tenant Voice, has two articles from SOS representative Stephanie Bastek talking about how it works with the national and international Housing Justice movements. She revealed that Housing Justice nonprofits in the U.S. provided them with actionable political intelligence.³¹²

It describes how “friends and contacts who work in the ‘affordable housing’ nonprofit sector told us” about the DC Department of Housing and Community Development’s private meetings. As a result, SOS “surprised our adversaries with an unexpected outcry at a politically inconvenient moment.”

Another overlap exists through the California-based Tenant and Neighborhoods Councils, another ATUN member. The August 2021 issue of its newsletter says that it was founded in May 2018 by members of the DSA’s Communist Caucus.³¹³

Chicago Tenants Movement’s Links to ATUN

The Chicago Tenants Movement (CTM) was launched in 2020 as a citywide coalition, with the Autonomous Tenants Union (ATU) listed as a charter member.³¹⁴ Over time, CTM and the broader Autonomous Tenant Union Network (ATUN) have become closely linked: CTM’s website borrows heavily from ATUN’s language and even directs supporters to ATUN’s official tenant-organizing guide. The connection is unmistakable—rather than two unrelated projects moving in parallel, CTM functions as part of the same organizing ecosystem that produced ATUN.³¹⁵

CTM’s mission statement drives the point home. It calls for replacing the “current housing system with one of collective ownership and self-management” and pledges to “liberate” communities from “oppression and domination of all kinds,” including “occupying police” and what it terms “racial-patriarchal capitalism.” This rhetoric is not the language of a conventional tenants’ rights campaign. While CTN is not a member of ATUN, it reflects the same revolutionary framework that defines ATUN’s national agenda.

With its mirrored rhetoric and radical program CTM shows how housing justice networks draw directly from Chicago’s long history of ideological activism. What presents itself as a tenants’ coalition is in practice part of a broader project advancing systemic political change under the banner of housing rights.

Right to the City Alliance’s Homes for All Campaign and Its Links to ATUN

The Right to the City Alliance (RTTC), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit, leads the national Homes for All campaign, which it says includes more than 90 organizations. Among its member groups are organizations with direct connections to the Autonomous Tenant Union Network (ATUN).

At least two ATUN entities are affiliated with RTTC: the Autonomous Tenants Union (ATU) and the Arizona-based People’s Defense Initiative (PDI). PDI’s own social media identifies its parent organization as the Tucson Tenants Union, itself a member of ATUN. These overlapping memberships demonstrate the ways in which national alliances like RTTC’s Homes for All campaign serve as hubs, linking local tenant unions and activist groups into broader advocacy networks.

PDI associates itself with the Antifa movement.³¹⁶ It posted a message from NYC Antifa on January 2, 2023.³¹⁷ PDI spreads anti-police bigotry by posting “ACAB,” an acronym for “All Cops Are Bastards,” and encourages lighting cop cars on fire.^{318,319}

On December 19, 2023, RTTC’s Instagram page published an Instagram post it jointly authored with the pro-Hamas 501(c)(3) nonprofits U.S. Campaign for Palestinian Rights (USCPR) and Grassroots Global Justice

Alliance that declared, “From Palestine to Mexico, all borders and militarized violence have got to go!”^{320,321,322}

RTTC’s statement on the first anniversary of the October 7 attacks blamed the entire conflict on Israel. It did say it “mourns the loss of innocent people in Palestine/Israel on October 7,” but that falls short of condemning the attacks and its perpetrators or calling for an end to terrorism and the pursuit of destroying Israel. It stated:

In the past months we’ve witnessed Israel expand its war on Palestine to Iran, Syria, and Yemen, and in the past week it has bombarded and invaded Lebanon...As an alliance fighting for housing justice, we are particularly appalled by Israel’s systematic destruction of housing and other critical social infrastructure in Gaza, and now in Lebanon....We honor those who continue to struggle for an end to militarism, displacement, racism, fascism, and apartheid. We honor those who continue to struggle for peace, justice, dignity, and democracy—from Palestine, to our communities right here in the U.S.³²³

RTTC’s website lists its “national housing partners” as 501(c)(4) nonprofit Action Center on Race and the Economy (ACRE); Alliance for Housing Justice, a project of the 501(c)(3) nonprofit Public Advocates; the Center for Popular Democracy (CPD) 501(c)(3) nonprofit and People’s Action 501(c)(4) nonprofit.^{324,325,326,327,328}

Its “united front partners” includes groups that are pro-terrorism and coalitions that have pro-terrorism members. The list consists of:

- Climate Justice Alliance (CJA), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit that provides artwork for protests that glorify the October 7, 2023 terrorist attacks, call for the elimination of the state of Israel, and quote terrorists like Ghassan Kanafani from the Marxist-Leninist PFLP terrorist group.^{329,330,331,332,333,334}
- Indigenous Environmental Network (IEN), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit that refers to the U.S. as

Turtle Island, demonizes the country, incites violence, and describes the October 7 terrorist attacks as “the Hamas retaliatory strike” without condemning the atrocities.^{335,336,337,338,339,340}

- Grassroots Global Justice Alliance (GGJA), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit with an official statement that condemns Israel but not Hamas or its October 7 attacks and states, “We recognize many similarities between the Palestinian resistance movement and US movements” GGJA supports. The statement quotes an organizer from the Union of Palestinian Women’s Committees, which is a front for the Marxist-Leninist PFLP terrorist group.^{341,342,343}

GGJA has also posted advice for resisting law enforcement. It defended the Antifa-associated anarchist terrorists in the Stop Cop City / Defend the Atlanta Forest coalition and has served as a supporter.^{344,345,346}

GGJA refuses to recognize the U.S.’s right to exist, instead referring to the country as “Turtle Island (so-called USA).” It says it seeks “to bring forth liberation and self-determination across Turtle Island.”^{347,348}

Other extremist members of GGJA who have expressed support for terrorism or anti-Americanism include IEN, Arab Resource and Organizing Center (AROC), a fiscally sponsored project of the Tides Center 501(c)(3) nonprofit; Palestinian Youth Movement (PYM), a fiscally sponsored project of the WESPAC Foundation 501(c)(3) nonprofit; Malcolm X Grassroots Movement, the Jews for Racial and Economic Justice 501(c)(3) nonprofit, and Dissenters.^{349,350,351,352,353,354,355}

- It Takes Roots (ITR) says it is an “alliance of alliances” that consists of “sister alliances” with RTTC, IEN, CJA and GGJ.^{356,357}

It responded to the October 7 attacks with an official statement that declared “we stand in unwavering solidarity with the Palestinian freedom struggle for self-determination” and condemned Israel without any criticism of the October 7 attacks, Hamas, or anti-Israeli terrorism.³⁵⁸

The statement then pushes readers to donate to the pro-terrorism groups AROC, PYM, USCPR, Adalah Justice Project, a fiscally sponsored project of the Tides Center and the Arab American Action Network 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{359,360}

- Green New Deal Network, a coalition that fundraises through the Tides Foundation 501(c)(3) nonprofit and has a significant number of extremist members.^{361,362,363}

Its Steering Committee includes GGJA, CJA, People’s Action and Sunrise, a 501(c)(4) nonprofit. Members include RTTC, IEN, CPD, the Indivisible 501(c)(4) nonprofit and the Greenpeace 501(c)(4) nonprofit, among others.^{364,365,366}

- Rising Majority, a fiscally sponsored project of the Common Counsel Foundation 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization. It reacted to the October 7 attacks with a statement that failed to condemn the attacks and declared, “we see many similarities between the resistance movement of Palestinians to military occupation and the movements we are part of here.”^{367,368,369,370}
- United Frontline Table, a coalition that includes CJA, IEN, GGJA, People’s Action, It Takes Roots, and other organizations.

In addition to these “united front partners,” RTTC has many state-level organizations listed among its members.

RTTC’s Connections to CAIR, Black Lives Matter

As mentioned earlier in this report, the link between the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), Black Lives Matter (BLM), and RTTC is not conjecture—it is visible in the coalition infrastructure that sustains BLM’s intersectional activism. While there is no evidence of a formal partnership between CAIR and RTTC, both organizations move in parallel within the broader orbit of BLM’s coalition politics.

CAIR has made its alignment with Black Lives Matter explicit. In the wake of nationwide protests, CAIR-Chicago declared that it “proudly stands in solidarity with Black communities and the Black Lives Matter Movement,” while also acknowledging anti-Blackness within Muslim communities and pledging to confront it. At the national level, CAIR has joined Muslim advocacy coalitions advancing demands that mirror BLM’s—from police accountability to shifting municipal budgets toward community services. These are not symbolic gestures; they represent CAIR’s consistent integration into the BLM framework.^{371,372}

That framework itself is crucial. From its inception, Black Lives Matter has functioned as more than a protest slogan; it has served as a coalition hub. Its decentralized structure and wide appeal have allowed groups with disparate missions—civil rights advocates, faith-based organizations, housing justice organizers, and immigration activists—to collaborate under the same umbrella, amplifying one another’s campaigns and normalizing cross-sector alliances.

Through its flagship “Homes for All” campaign, RTTC positions housing as a human right, connecting affordability and eviction defense to broader struggles against systemic racism. This mission dovetails with BLM’s framing of racial inequality as both economic and social. RTTC affiliates regularly surface in BLM-aligned campaigns and demonstrations, from eviction defense actions to demands for reallocating public resources.

The overlap is not only thematic but also personal. Alicia Garza, one of the three women who co-founded Black Lives Matter, served as chair of RTTC’s board in 2011, years before BLM became a nationally recognized movement. This leadership role underscores how the movements have been woven together from the beginning.³⁷³

The result is a structural pattern that merits attention.

CAIR and RTTC may not be operating hand-in-hand, but within BLM's coalition space they converge—signing onto the same demands, endorsing the same platforms, and appearing at the same rallies. Black Lives Matter has provided the connective platform through which Muslim civil-rights advocates and housing justice organizers reinforce each other's causes, broadening their reach and magnifying their influence.

Tenants Together and its Links to ATUN and Other Extremists

Tenants Together is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit that is a coalition of organizations in California. Tenants Together's website identifies it as a member of RTTC and its Homes for All campaign.^{374 375}

Its list of member organizations includes ATUN members Glendale Tenants Union, Los Angeles Tenants Union, Oakland Tenants Union, and Pasadena Tenants Union.³⁷⁶

Tenants Together's partner organizations include the Los Angeles, Sacramento, and Chico chapters of DSA.

Housing Justice for All and its Links to ATUN and Other Extremists

Housing Justice for All, also known as the Upstate Downstate Housing Alliance, is a fiscally sponsored project of Voices of Community Activists and Leaders-New York (VOCAL-NY), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{377,378,379}

It says it is a coalition of over 80 organizations in New York. However, its list of members numbers over 200. The list includes ATUN member Crown Heights Tenants Union and ATUN affiliate Ridgewood Tenants Union.³⁸⁰

The coalition also includes:

- Nine chapters of DSA
- 527 (also known as a political organization) nonprofit Communist Party USA and its New York Young Communist League³⁸¹
- 501(c)(4) nonprofit Socialist Alternative
- The New York City chapter of the extremist 501(c)(3) nonprofit Jewish Voice for Peace³⁸²
- Youth Alliance for Housing, whose statement addressing the October 7 attacks did not criticize the atrocities or Hamas.³⁸³
 - It declared that it “stands in solidarity with the Palestinian people and their fight against settler colonialism.”
 - It also referred to the U.S. as “Amerikkka,” a term used by anti-American extremists to depict the country as equivalent to the KKK white supremacist group. It says it is “operated under a Joint Plan of Work” with the Virginia Organizing 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{384,385}
 - Jews for Racial and Economic Justice, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit that made an anti-American post on the Fourth of July in 2024.^{386,387}
 - Desis Rising Up and Moving (DRUM), a 501(c)(3) nonprofit that reacted to the October 7 attacks by endorsing an anti-Israel statement by Rising Majority, a fiscally sponsored project of the Common Counsel Foundation 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization. The text did not criticize Hamas or the attacks and stated, “we see many similarities between the resistance movement of Palestinians to military occupation and the movements we are part of here.”^{388,389,390,391,392}

Housing Justice for All is involved in anti-Israel activism and endorsed demands that Israel cease military action on October 20, 2023.³⁹³

The post directly said the coalition was being led to join the cause by three of its members, ATUN member Crown Heights Tenants Union, DSA's New York City chapter, and DRUM.

The fiscal sponsor of Housing Justice for All, VOCAL-NY, has received “millions of dollars in funding from the city and state,” according to City Journal.³⁹⁴

The Housing Justice National Platform for a Homes Guarantee is a project of the Alliance for Housing Justice (AHJ), which itself is a fiscally sponsored project of the 501(c)(3) nonprofit Public Advocates.^{395,396,397}

The AHJ website reads the organization is “powered by” the aforementioned groups RTTC, CPD (also known as Popular Democracy), People’s Action, Housing Justice for All NY, also known as the Upstate Downstate Housing Alliance and the 501(c)(3) nonprofits National Housing Law Project, PolicyLink, PowerSwitch Action, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Poverty and Race Research Action Council, Liberation in a Generation, and Public Advocates.^{398,399,400,401,402}

The Housing Justice Platform has a long list of organizational endorsers on the national, state and local levels.⁴⁰³

Other Extremist Groups in the Housing Justice Movement

Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP)

The Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP), a 501(c)(3), has received support from Tides-affiliated entities and has coordinated anti-sweep campaigns across cities, tying housing to anti-capitalist critiques in publications like Street Spirit, which labels U.S. governance “neoliberal fascism.” In fact, the nonprofit glorifies violence targeting law enforcement and is a state-level endorser of the Housing Justice platform.^{404,405,406}

One of WRAP’s board members, Jade Arellano, is currently RTTC’s National Organizer for Infrastructure Development.⁴⁰⁷

WRAP’s Instagram posts dehumanize police officers by depicting them as malicious pigs. A December 2024 post refers to police officers that swept through a homeless encampment as “the kkkolonial [sic] army.”^{408 409}

A post from 2020 says “Abolish the Police” and “black liberation” and shows a panther pouncing on a police officer drawn as a pig. Another post that year has the words “abolish police” and “cops kill” and shows law enforcement equipment in flames.^{410 411}

A 2018 post idolizes anti-American extremist Assata Shakur, praising her as one of the “women of the resistance” and “potent model as an activist willing to risk her life and freedom for the liberation of oppressed peoples.”⁴¹²

It acknowledges that she joined the Black Liberation Army terrorist group in 1971 and that the FBI considered it to be an anarchist group. It then mentions that she escaped from prison in 1979 and escaped to Cuba in 1984 where the communist government harbored her. It doesn’t mention that she was in prison because she was convicted of murdering a police officer in 1973.

Its currently listed members include:⁴¹³

- Housing and Neighborhood Defense (HAND), a fiscally sponsored project of Western Regional Advocacy Project (WRAP). HAND participated in ATUN’s national conference in 2024 and held a joint session about “Neighborhood Crisis Response” with ATUN member Crown Heights Tenants Union.^{414,415,416}
- Colorado Palestine Coalition (CPC) because “We must support those evicted from their homes abroad!!!” Most of CPC’s official members are pro-terrorism groups.⁴¹⁷

CPC coauthored a post on the first anniversary of the October 7 attacks with artwork glorifying the violence, including a drawing of a paraglider.⁴¹⁸ A post on August 2, 2024, read, “SUPPORT THE RESISTANCE! From Palestine; to Yemen, to Lebanon!” It is obviously referring to the various terrorist groups in Gaza and Israel, the Houthis in Yemen and Hezbollah in Lebanon.⁴¹⁹
- Los Angeles Community Action Network, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit.⁴²⁰
- Love and Justice in the Streets, which WRAP is the fiscal sponsor for Street Spirit, a newspaper started by WRAP founding member Paul Boden.⁴²¹ It published an article by Boden in May 2025, declaring that “America has implemented the long-planned and inevitable work plan of neoliberal governance in the United States of America.”⁴²²

- Stop the Sweeps Seattle

WRAP’s list of national partners includes:

- Poor People’s Campaign, which is currently receiving donations through the Tides Center’s Kairos Center and the Repairers of the Breach 501(c)(3) nonprofit.^{423 424 425}
- National Alliance of HUD Tenants
- National Association for the Education of Homeless Children and Youth, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit.
- National Health Care for the Homeless Council, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit.
- National Law Center on Homelessness and Poverty, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit. This is the legal name of the organization referred to above as the National Homelessness Law Center.

Sunrise Movement

Extending this pattern, the Sunrise Movement, with DAF support via Network for Good, integrates universal access to housing into its Green New Deal while endorsing Stop Cop City protests, linking climate activism to anti-police disruptions.⁴²⁶

Sunrise declared its support for Stop Cop City / Defend the Atlanta Forest coalition that is linked to anarchist terrorism in April 2023. It posted, “We continue to stand in solidarity with the forest defenders fighting to stop Cop City.”⁴²⁷

Sunrise also tried to help them fundraise by writing, “to support the fight donate to the Atlanta Solidarity Fund,” (ASF) which is an initiative of the Network for Strong Communities.^{428 429} ASF was helping the accused terrorists with bail funds and legal support.⁴³⁰ Prosecutors alleged that three ASF leaders faced racketeering charges. Charges were later dropped.⁴³¹

Sunrise does not appear to have actually condemned violence or terrorist groups like Hamas.

On the section of its website about its principles, it describes the government as a “violent, militarized state” and then says, “We, as Sunrise, will not win by confronting their violence with violent actions.”

Sunrise’s statement about Luigi Mangione, who murdered UnitedHealthcare CEO Brian Thompson on December 4, 2024, has a large photo of Mangione that appears to glorify him. It says “we hold fiercely to our principle of nonviolence” but doesn’t condemn his violence.⁴³²

At least two Sunrise chapters have expressed support for Hamas and its atrocities on October 7, 2023.

The Pittsburgh and New Orleans chapters are official supporters of the Coalition to March on the DNC, which was an alliance that included over 150 extremist groups and endorsed the October 7 atrocities.^{433 434 435}

In October 2021, Sunrise announced it would withdraw from a rally promoting statehood for Washington, D.C., because three Jewish organizations that believe Israel has a right to exist were involved. Sunrise said it would not be a part of coalitions that include Zionists and condemned Israel as a “colonial project” without saying a single critical word about anti-Israel terrorism.⁴³⁶

Sunrise depicts the Chinese Communist Party as a victim of the U.S. and Sunrise caved to Chinese Communist Party supporters in June 2021 by cancelling a speaking engagement with an anti-CCP activist.^{437 438}

Sunrise condemned tourism to Hawaii in May 2022, and expressed its desire to see the state secede from the U.S.⁴³⁹

Dream Defenders

Dream Defenders (DD) is a fiscally sponsored project of the Tides Advocacy 501(c)(4) nonprofit organization.⁴⁴⁰

⁴⁴¹ It believes housing is a human right. DD glorifies violence in toolkits praising Hamas tactics, framing housing rights within abolitionist calls to dismantle capitalism and policing.⁴⁴²

DD identifies itself as socialist, Black feminist, internationalist, and abolitionist. It explains that its definition of abolitionism is eliminating all prisons, policing, surveillance, and punishment.⁴⁴³ It advocates for “nonviolent resistance” in order to achieve “the destruction of the political and economic systems of Capitalism and Imperialism as well as Patriarchy.”⁴⁴⁴

However, it has a long history of supporting terrorist groups and glorifying anti-American violence.⁴⁴⁵ It is one of about 250 anti-Israel organizations that condemned the Fourth of July holiday in 2024 or expressed anti-American sentiment instead of patriotism.⁴⁴⁶

DD’s reaction to the October 7, 2023 terrorist attacks was to create and distribute a “Black and Palestinian Solidarity Organizing Toolkit” with an image of a Hamas paraglider committing the attacks with the words “Black Liberation for Palestinian Freedom” above it. The guide also included links for three guides endorsing illegal acts like property destruction, taking over buildings, blockades, economic sabotage, using false IDs, and obstructing law enforcement.⁴⁴⁷

Although DD is supportive of Hamas, it is more supportive of Hamas’s Marxist ally, PFLP. It has repeatedly praised PFLP for fighting “global imperialism” and “capitalist oppression.”^{448,449,450,451,452}

Alliance for Global Justice

Likewise, the 501(c)(3) nonprofit Alliance for Global Justice (AFGJ), receiving foundation grants, sponsors campaigns reclaiming housing through takeovers, defending it as resistance to “structural genocide” while backing PFLP fronts.⁴⁵³

An April 2022 article on its website asserts:

While the international community defends the right to housing as a fundamental and inalienable human right, the denial of housing rights to Black and Brown communities remains foundational to U.S.

policy-making and law enforcement. For centuries now, lawmakers have facilitated and law enforcement has promoted deadly displacement and dispossession of historically colonized communities. From “Black Lives Matter” to “housing is a human right,” movements are confronting structural genocide.^{454,455}

The article states that AFGJ is the fiscal sponsor for the Poor People’s Economic Human Rights Campaign that is “organizing housing takeover campaigns in Philadelphia and other cities across the country, [and] affirms that people have the right to reclaim the basic necessities of life, including housing.”⁴⁵⁶

AFGJ is the fiscal sponsor for PFLP front Samidoun.⁴⁵⁷ The U.S. and Canadian governments designated and sanctioned Samidoun in October 2024 for being a “sham charity” set up to finance PFLP.⁴⁵⁸

AFGJ seeks the overthrow of the U.S.’s “liberal democracy” and “global capitalism.”⁴⁵⁹

AFGJ originates from a group called the Nicaragua Network that advocated for the communist Sandinistas. It consistently defends enemies of the West, particularly the communist and Marxist-influenced governments in Cuba, Venezuela, Nicaragua, China, and North Korea.⁴⁶⁰ It also endorsed Russia’s invasion of Ukraine.⁴⁶¹

People’s Housing Project

On March 25, 2024, the Peoples Housing Project posted in support of “Palestinian’s right to resistance” and demanded “Full Liberation of Palestine NOW!” and the release of all Palestinian “political prisoners,” which is the term that supporters of anti-Israel terrorism use for detained and imprisoned terror suspects. It declared, “Fund Housing, Not Genocide!”⁴⁶²

Equality for Flatbush

The Brooklyn-based Equality for Flatbush (E4F), a fiscally sponsored project of the Interreligious Foundation for Community Organization 501(c)(3), promotes police abolition in gentrification fights, declaring solidarity with Palestinian “resistance” post-October 7.⁴⁶³

E4F promotes housing as a right and believes “in the abolition of the police, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), and prisons.”^{464 465} It describes itself as a Black Lives Matter group.⁴⁶⁶

One day after the October 7, 2023 terrorist attacks, E4F declared:

(E4F) stands in solidarity with the people of Palestine as they fight for their liberation from a genocidal Zionist apartheid state....As Black people, we know, there cannot be a call for “Peace” until there is Justice!...As we fight to stop police murders and displacement caused by the gentrification of Brooklyn, NY, we will continue to support the Palestinian Resistance Movement until Palestine is FREE!⁴⁶⁷

October 22nd Alliance to End Homelessness

South Florida’s October 22nd Alliance to End Homelessness, led by Jeff Weinberger, organizes anti-Israel protests framing Hamas actions as self-defense, chanting genocidal slogans while advocating an end to homelessness.⁴⁶⁸ Weinberger was described by a local news outlet as one of the “lead organizers” of a protest against a subsidiary of the Israeli defense contractor Elbit Systems in Boca Raton in November 2023.⁴⁶⁹

The protest included activists from the pro-terrorism groups Students for Justice in Palestine, Dream Defenders, and Food Not Bombs Fort Lauderdale, which glorifies the use of Molotov cocktails.^{470,471,472} Food Not Bombs Fort Lauderdale also displays the anarcho-communism flag.⁴⁷³

Weinberger claimed that Palestinians “do not support nor condemn the action of Hamas.”

He framed the October 7 attacks as acts of self-defense, saying, “We recognize that what Hamas did was a desperate act borne out of deep, deep oppression, living in what’s been called the largest concentrated open air concentration camp on the planet.”

He accused Elbit Systems of being “a merchant of death and genocide and apartheid” and said, “This is in the DNA of Zionism.”

Protestors chanted “From the River to the Sea, Palestine Will Be Free,” which is a genocidal call for the elimination of the state of Israel.

What’s Really at Stake

The evolution of the housing-justice movement shows how a cause rooted in humanitarian concern can be transformed into a vehicle for ideological struggle. By redefining homelessness as evidence of systemic oppression—capitalism, racism, imperialism—activist organizations have created an opening for groups whose priorities extend far beyond housing. Coalition structures allow these actors to embed themselves within legitimate advocacy networks, borrow credibility, and redirect campaigns toward broader political aims.

That redirection has consequences. Policies once centered on treatment, transitional housing, and measurable reductions in street homelessness are increasingly displaced by unconditional housing guarantees and rhetoric framed in revolutionary terms. The response of several housing-justice groups to the October 7 Hamas attacks exposed the degree of ideological alignment: organizations dedicated to homelessness issued statements that excused or minimized terrorism, revealing how advocacy for the unhoused can be repurposed to serve foreign or extremist causes.

The point is not that every housing advocate is complicit, but that the movement has become porous to infiltration. When humanitarian platforms are co-opted in this way, policy debates risk being driven less by evidence of what reduces homelessness and more by ideological commitments imported from unrelated struggles. Recognizing that dynamic is essential for separating interventions that genuinely serve the unhoused from those that instrumentalize their suffering.

CONCLUSION

This report has traced how America's homelessness response has been shaped not by a lack of money or goodwill, but by the institutions and coalitions that channel both. Government and philanthropic funding together sustain a nonprofit sector of extraordinary scale. Yet too often, those groups engage in litigation, lobbying, and ideological campaigns rather than to interventions that demonstrably reduce unsheltered homelessness. The Grants Pass case made this visible: hundreds of well-financed nonprofits rallied, not to expand shelter or treatment, but to limit local authority to address encampments—illustrating the increasingly dominate role advocacy plays in this field.

The analysis also shows how coalition structures have enabled a different kind of capture. By framing homelessness primarily as evidence of systemic oppression, parts of the movement have created space for extremist factions to embed themselves, borrow legitimacy, and redirect advocacy. The responses of a component of the housing-justice organizations to the October 7 Hamas attacks revealed the extent of this shift: rhetoric once centered on shelter and services now echoed foreign ideological battles. What began as a fight against homelessness has, in many quarters, become a stage for broader political projects.

Coalition dynamics make this danger even clearer. The Right to the City Alliance (RTTC), one of the most prominent national housing-justice coalitions, illustrates the point. In 2011, Alicia Garza chaired RTTC's board; two years later, she co-founded Black Lives Matter. Since BLM's emergence in 2013, RTTC and BLM-aligned networks have often operated in parallel. Those same coalitions have repeatedly intersected with the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), an organization with documented Muslim Brotherhood roots. Together, these overlapping networks issued statements after the October 7 Hamas attacks that condemned Israel while declining to denounce terrorism—evidence that housing-justice advocacy has become entangled with factions advancing pro-Hamas and openly anti-American agendas.⁴⁷⁴

The implications are stark. Without clearer boundaries between service and advocacy, and without transparency in how public and philanthropic dollars are used, the United States will continue to spend at scale while leaving tens of thousands on the streets. Reform requires more than funding: it requires accountability, a focus on recovery-oriented programs with measurable results, and vigilance against the misuse of humanitarian platforms for ideological ends. Only then can the nation's compassion be turned into solutions that genuinely help people off the streets rather than into instruments for agendas that have little to do with homelessness at all.
